Press and School in Education

By E. RUTH PYRTLE

President of the National Education Association

EVERY day 24,000,000 American children attend school. Every day 40,000,000 newspapers go to American readers. Every contact of school or press shapes opinion closer to the sharp line of truth. There are no other institutions in the world that can compare with these two in power and influence.

The school takes the mind while it is plastic. It bestows upon the child a knowledge of the best that the race has learned in the age-long school of experience. The press builds upon these fundamentals the towers of opinion that shape the skyline of today's world.

Back of these two great educational institutions are 23,000 editors and 800,000 school teachers. Their services are so closely akin that only blindness could be responsible for a lack of mutual understanding and accord.

The interdependence of press and school is widely recognized. Particularly has the press come to the aid of the school whenever the efficiency of its service has been threatened by close-sighted attempts at retrenchment. Newspaper men have endeavored to educate the school teacher to a sense of the news values in his methods, aims and results. The response to this training is indicated by the growing number of public school systems which have a member of the staff to assist the news reporters in uncovering facts of interest to readers.

On the other hand, the schools are increasingly making use of the newspaper. There are very few school libraries today that do not have current news sheets on their racks. Schools are educating their pupils to rely upon the press for their continuation education.

The high character of most newspapers today admits them without question to the position of textbooks in the schools. Unfortunately all newspapers are not written upon the same high plane. School teachers deplore this. Frequently they are heard to say that newspapers are too sensational and cheap to use in the schoolroom. Undoubtedly some of them are. Whose fault is it? Where is the taste of the American reading public created? It should at least be deeply influenced in the schoolrooms.

If the taste of the reading public is for information that is not only unwholesome but harmful, there is important work for the schools to do. In that work they need the co-operation of purposeful editors.

The schools have no desire to censor the press. What the press needs is some sort of an educational philosophy, just as the educators have. Editors should draw up a statement of general principles of education thru the press. They might well state in a general way their objectives, their methods and the character of the content of their newspaper education. In the preparation of this statement the educators might be of help. Likewise the educators could wisely include editors in their conferences on educational philosophy. Only thru some such system of co-operative effort can the foundations and superstructure of education be consistent.

The above is one of a series of "Better Citizenship" editorials by prominent Americans contributed to the Andover News, member of the National Editorial Association.

A man has come out with the statement that he has just finished reading 1,000 novels, and that 900 of them were valueless. It looks like he wasted a great deal of time.

Practical Trades Needed

THE Phillippine government will henceforth tell students who are sent to the United States what courses to study. An over supply of physicians and lawyers on the islands, has led to a shortage of technically trained college graduates.

In view of the big demand for technologists and experts in the industrial arts they will be permitted to study only fish, meat and vegetable canning and other such industries.

Heretofore government students, or pensionades, as they are known there, were free to choose their careers. In most instances they took up law, medicine, education and similar academic courses. Upon returning to the Phillippines they found difficulty in obtaining work, since they found their profession crowded with young men and women who had been well trained in the Islands for such lines of work. Many of them returned to the United States, thus yielding the Philippine government no return for the money spent for their education.

The new policy is designed to make the pensionada system more profitable, both to the student and to the government.

After shaking hands with some men, we readily understand why old Lizzie sometimes registers a kick when being cranked.

Looking into the future would be a fine thing, if we could only select the things we would like to see.

A Thought of Thanksgiving

THE proclamation by President Hoover serves to remind us that Thanksgiving Day is near—a season when "the harvest has been gathered in, the thoughts of our forefathers turned toward God with thanksgiving for the blessings of plenty and provision against the needs of winter."

There is no holiday more needful on the American calendar than Thanksgiving. It was instituted and generally observed at a time when the colonists on the bleak New England shore had little to be thankful for, judged by present standards.

People, as a matter of fact, rarely ever appreciate blessings that come without sacrifice. In the matter of government, it is customary to take for granted its benefits, privileges and opportunities, and think and talk only of government's deficiencies, which, in a representative government such as ours, are largely chargeable to the shortcomings of a citizenship which possesses the power to make and unmake presidents, governors, legislators and mayors.

Whenever an institution, a law or a custom in a republic like ours, lags far behind the conscience and the conduct of the average man, it is overthrown, generally after a struggle. In every struggle every good citizen should lend a hand in the cause of right. But evil institutions would disappear more rapidly if we would cease this shotgun sort of complaining, which scatters everywhere and wounds nowhere, and focus our efforts upon the immediate evils about us; some of them close home.

Many people can talk glibly about the imperfections of our government as compared with the perfect government every man can easily construct in his own imagination by leaving out of account the materials with which a government must be constructed, who haven't the slightest conception of the advantages of the institutions we already have and what tremendous progress they represent as compared with the institutions of a century or even a half century ago. Nor do they realize the cost at which our free institutions have been attained, not by ourselves, but by others.

It is well to look forward, but a lot of people have been killed by trains because they didn't understand that safety first requires a look backward. He who looks backward without looking forward is a reactionary and hopeless; he who looks forward without looking backward is a visionary and is dangerous.

Those who look both ways, and in the light of the past, the present and the future, interpret the happenings of the age in which they live, are responsible for all of the progress the world has ever made or ever will make in the promotion of human welfare.

Poor Visibility

THIS is the time of year when a mixture of weather has much to do with automobile driving and auto wrecks. In addition to clouds, mist and rain, one finds dust blowing in the air to make visibility poor.

That's bad enough for most of us when we drive on the highways. But there are some who seem to be unmoved even by a worse form of interference.

These are the motorists who do not only leave the grime on their cars, but seem to be unmolested by the thick layer of mud on their windshields.

So thickly covered are the windshields and windows on many cars these days, that they offer not only a poor picture to others, but an element of danger to those within the cars.

No driver can judge distance with his windshield covered with thick dirt. No driver can see well enough for safe progress, with mud constantly before his eyes. No driver should be permitted to venture out before he washes this mud off.

If we don't care about appearance, at least we should consider our safety and that of others. Those who neglect this are reckless drivers and should be treated as such. It is perfectly within reason, on this ground, for a traffic officer to arrest such a neglectful motorist or at least make him clean his windshield.

A Shopper's Guide

WHY waste time in useless "shopping around" when the advertisements lay before you the choicest ware of every progressive merchant in town?

Why use needless effort in an endless store-to-store quest when the advertisements enable you to make your choice of the first merchandise without leaving your home?

Why pay more than you ought when you can stretch your dollar to the elastic limit by taking advantage of the bargains and good buys that are advised in this paper?

Why risk dissatisfaction by buying unknown, unbranded goods when you can assure yourself complete satisfaction by buying an advertised product, backed by the integrity of a man or group of men who spend real money to establish their name and to build up public good will?

Two Elements

THERE are many things that are essential to the growth and proper development of a town, and the greatest of these is co-operation.

Conversely, strife prompted by selfish interests that demand satisfaction is its death.

No matter what you may think about the preachments that have been delivered about co-operation, nothing has been found that is its equal in forging ahead in any enterprise.

It is not to be presumed that everyone will think alike. Men will differ as to means to be employed and are entitled to their views, but they should be willing to work together when a common goal—a greater community is sought.

Co-operation creates and strife destroys. Co-operation builds up and strife tears down.

There is no mental ground. All of us are either loyal and progressive citizens or we are trouble makers—nothing more.

In Croatia young women present an apple to the man of their choice, and information received is that he usually bites.

In the absence of a nut crop this year, it is reported that squirrels have stored away a good crop of lost golf balls.

Money does not necessarily produce happiness, but its possession may go a long way in turning the trick.
