Old Age Pensions

WITHOUT attempting to pass upon the merits or otherwise of the bill which has been introduced by Senator Wagner of New York and Representative Lewis of Maryland, providing for a national system of old-age pensions, we believe that the great majority of Americans are in hearty agreement with the fundamental principles involved.

We know of nobody who is not in favor of some effective system of providing for those whom in old age, are unable to support themselves in decent comfort.

We believe that the plan of building up, during an individual's working life, a fund to which the worker, the employer and perhaps the State are contributors, which will provide an annuity for old age, is the soundest possible way of accomplishing this end. It removes completely any possible stigma of pauperism, which is inevitably attached to gratuitous grants of unearned benefits.

As to what the amount of such pensions should be, and whether the compulsory retirement age should be 60, 65 or 70 years, there is a great diversity of opinion.

There is much to be said for the voluntary annuity system proposed for the "self-employed," whereby the farmer, the doctor, the lawyer or anyone else who is not attached to a payroll, can place a small part of his or her income in trust with the Government, from year to year, to accumulate until the retiring age is reached, when an income for life may then be derived from the accumulated fund. We understand such a system has been employed in England for more than two hundred years.

To the hopeful elderly persons who have been looking forward to immediate old-age pension checks from the Government, the bill as introduced offers little solace. Provision is made for joint state and Federal relief for those who are practically destitute, but the age at which this relief shall begin may be placed as high as 70 years. This does not bring much comfort to those in their sixties who have been led to believe they may be a chance of getting $200 a month right now.

At any rate, the Wagner-Lewis bill is a start toward a goal at which the nation cannot, at later must arrive.

An editorial starts out with this phrase: "Government is maintained by taxation on industry." If this assertion is true why should Andover people have to dig so hard for tax money just now.--Just another one-track mind.

Why not pass a law to make every person blend two slices of bacon with his breakfast every morning, to use up waste hog production?

Learned men say the time is not far distant when man and animals will talk to each other. When that time arrives there's a barking dog we know of that's going to have his feelings hurt.

Own Country Most Attractive

SOME people have an intense yearning to visit foreign lands. They are not satisfied with the place they call home.

You can stand on a certain street corner in Paris and see people from many nations stroll by within a limited time. It is the same in London, and Rome and in any of the other great metropolitan cities of the old world.

Wherever there is wealth and fashion and excitement you will find congregated people from the four corners of the earth. They dress and act a little differently, and speak in many tongues, but otherwise they are just people—like yourself, and others around you.

Most travelers return from abroad glad to get home and be among the familiar customs and sights of their native country. And many will agree that there is more to be seen here in our own country than there is abroad so far as scenic, educational and interesting features are concerned. There is more to be gained in every respect by seeing our own country than there is traveling in foreign lands.

And there is infinitely more to be gained by being happy and contented in our own homes.

Our Slang Language

THE purists frown on slang, no matter how expressive it may be. The principal objection to slang appears to be that it is of questionable parentage.

This is to be inferred from a university lecturer who expressed great regret that dumbbell had not been originated by some literary genius so that it would now be accepted as the best of English.

Of course, it would then cease to be slang, and by the same token, it would probably not be so popular and used with so much relish by the man in the street.

The fact is that many words and phrases now labeled slang may have been originated by literary men who did not appreciate their value until their popularity and diffusion made it too late for them to be convincing in their claims at origination.

"Get the picture?" is an expression that is an orphan in the literary world, yet it fits when you want to ask the question, "do you understand?" For certainly we understand nothing until we have a mental picture of the subject.

Slang is persistent. It is a social climber and it often gets into good society, the purists notwithstanding. If it expresses the meaning one wishes to convey better than any other word or group of words it shouldn't be condemned.

Demands Prompt Reply

MOST every person is prompt in responding to the ring of the telephone bell. The very idea that some one has a personal message to be delivered only to one person arouses curiosity and intrigues the interest.

Has it ever occurred to you that back of every advertisement in this paper is a someone with a personal message for everyone who reads it. That it is just as important in its way as the telephone message that brings your prompt response to the ring of the phone? More often than not these advertisements were written with some individual in mind.

It is impossible for merchants to give their customers a ring about their goods or their services. So they call these things to the attention of prospective customers thru our columns.

The person who does not give an advertisement the same attention as given a phone call is making a great mistake. Advertisements help everyone economize and keep posted on news of vital interest to themselves and their pocketbooks.

Don't lay aside this paper without reading the advertisements!

Biting off more than you can chew beats going hungry.

THE STORY SO FAR

SIXTH INSTALLMENT

Nancy Gordon trades herself in marriage for fifteen thousand dollars—the price of her family honor—and the freedom of her brother, Roddy, who stole, for a woman, that amount from the bank in which he works. Nancy, desperately in love with young Page Roemer, nevertheless agrees to a secret elopement with Dr. Richard Morgan, and with the money he loans her prevents Roddy's arrest. Dr. Morgan is loved by Helena Haddon, a sophisticated young married woman, but he adores Nancy and hopes to win her after marriage. In Washington they are married. Nancy is Richard's bride—and afraid of him.

Now go on with the story.

Then he saw, lying on the table, one of Nancy's gloves. It lay there, holding the perfect form of Nancy's hand—like a thing alive. He blushed up to his hair, his eyes fixed on it.

"Sit down," he said finally, drawing forward a chair that was not Nancy's. "You spoke of Kingdon. What's wrong with him?"

Helena laughed bitterly, refusing the chair, her green eyes on him. "King's reading Voltaire now — I wish he had some real work to do besides sitting in the back room at the bank on great occasions. It's awful to be rich and idle and hang around all day reading French. My father and my brothers all worked; I'm not used to idle men. Richard, I'll quarrel with him dreadfully if he doesn't go off for golf. I want you to send him."

Richard moved over to the mantel and rested his elbows on it, shading his face. "I can't urge any more of it, Helena. King's not strong enough this spring. Besides, he's just gone for the tournament in Washington, hasn't he? He told me so. You both ought to go to Europe."

She stared at him, startled. Then a slow hot blush went up over the long oval of her face.

"I didn't know he was ill," she said slowly, watching Richard.

"He's not ill—he's got a weak heart, that's all—I'm taking care of him."

"Keeping him alive?" she looked away. This was not what she had come to say; her heart was stormy now. She put her hand suddenly on the glove. "That's Nancy Gordon's," she said defiantly. "You're in love with that girl, Richard!"

He turned toward her, meeting her glance coldly.

"Do you want me to prescribe for you or King today, Helena?" he asked shortly.

She stood quite still, her eyes fixed on his. For a moment, the very forces of life seemed suspended, her green eyes were as glass, she barely breathed. He had never seen her like this before. Then suddenly she began to laugh wildly, hysterically, choking back her tears.

"Oh, how funny! Your blushing, Richard," she gasped. "I didn't mean anything. Prescribe for us, both, do! I'm an awfully good patient, you know it."

He smiled grimly. "No, you're not, but here's a prescription—it's for nerves, Helena," he added coolly, holding it out.

She caught her breath, his anger seemed to burn his way thru to her consciousness, but in a moment she controlled herself.

"I'm sorry I offended you, Richard," she said, with amazing gentleness.

He nodded. "You haven't."

She gave him an odd look, her hand on the door. "Oh, yes, I have—but I didn't think of you—I was sure that Nancy Gordon was engaged to Page Roemer. She is, isn't she?"

Richard held the door open for her gravely. "I suggest that you ask her," was all he said.

Helena laughed, but she said no more. She stood a moment, looking back at him. An unhappy woman, unhappily in love with him, and he knew it.

* * *

Mrs. Gordon was sitting in the old wicker rocking chair, by the library window, her hands lying idle in her lap. She could not read, she could not even knit; she had cried over Roddy until her eyelids were puffed and her eyes ached. He was safe, she knew it, but—now that she knew he was safe—she began to feel the disgrace that his mere rescue from jail could not wipe out. Her boy had stolen money! The escape from punishment did not sponge out the sin.

She had borne him, and she had reared him and he was a thief. His father called him that and she cringed from it as if she had been struck a blow. She wanted to cry, to throw herself into someone's arms and cry like a girl, but Mr. Gordon was not receptive. He was there. He had come in from the bank and was sitting grimly upright in his chair, reading the paper.

They had been sitting thus half an hour when she heard the familiar sound of the gate and started up.

"Papa, it's Nancy!"

He laid his paper on his knee. The broad afternoon light fell on his worn face and his wife was shocked.

They heard the door open, a light step, and Nancy came into the room. She was very pale but her blue eyes shone. She came slowly toward them and stood still.

"I don't want you to worry any more," she said abruptly. "I borrowed that money from Richard Morgan. Roddy and I will pay him back. I—married him yesterday."

Her mother dropped back into her rocker, speechless, but her father rose. His face turned gray.

"What did you say?" he demanded.

"I said I married Richard Morgan yesterday, in Washington, because he gave me the money to save Roddy."

"Where's Roddy?" Mr. Gordon's voice shook, "where is he now? He had no business to take that money from you."

No one answered him and he broke loose in terrible denunciation. All the pent-up misery found vent. He made no bones about it. He spoke the truth as he saw it, spoke it brutally without seeing its effect.

The storm of his wrath swept over Nancy's bowed head like a hurricane—she clung to a little table in the center of the room.

"What kind of a girl are you?" roared Mr. Gordon, "what did you do? Go down there and tell him you'd marry him for fifteen thousand dollars?"

"Yes."

Nancy fixed her blue eyes on her father. He was so amazed that his mouth hung open. His shot had been a random one; that he had hit the bull's eye nearly prostrated him with horror and dismay.

"Good God!" he said below his breath.

Then he rallied himself. "I'll wire Roddy, I'll make him confess and bring that money back—it isn't his to pay in. I'll—I'll—" he sputtered breathlessly.

"You can't," said Nancy, "he's put back; he's not going to confess and go to prison now!"

"He shall—I say he shall!"

Mr. Gordon slammed an old chair back with such violence that he broke a leg off. It toppled over helplessly and fell into the corner with a crash.

"I'd a darned sight rather that Roddy stayed in jail for life than to have him take what money! Can you see that your daughter's sold herself?" he appealed to his wife. There was a terrible vehemence in his tone.

"Where's that man?" he swung around on Nancy, "where's Morgan?"

"He came home with me—he's in his office now. We—we haven't told anyone—he wanted to come here with me, but I—"

"I should think he'd better come here like a man. I want to ask him if he thinks he's living in his grandfather's time. I reckon old Morgan bought his slaves about the same way—only cheaper!"

"Papa!" his wife almost shrieked now, "Papa, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

"I am, I'm ashamed to have such children! I've got a pair of them—the boy steals, and the girl sells herself to the first rich man who'll—who'll pay for her."

"Hush!" Mrs. Gordon cried, "hush Papa."

Nancy, who had never moved from her table, did not lift her eyes now, but her white lips moved.

"Let him alone, Mama; it's true! Only a minister married us in the church. It—it wasn't an auction, Papa."

Her father snorted with fury. "True! I reckon it is! There's one thing I'd like to say to you, tho," he added with sudden and terrible courtesy, "if you'll permit me, Nancy?"

She choked back a sob.

"It's this—" he took a step nearer, striking his fist on the table—"you've sold yourself darned cheap."

She gazed at him, speechless.

"You're young, you're strong, you're good looking, you ought to have made a better bargain, Nancy. I've heard my father say that a pretty slave girl always brought a big bid. You're too cheap!"

"Papa!" Mrs. Gordon rose from her chair, fairly tottering on her feet, but snatching at her husband's coattails. "Don't you see that—that you're killing the child?"

He swung free of her with an angry swish of his garments, a mild-mannered man beside himself.

"She can stand it. She's got an altered[illegible] brass to go and tell a man she'd marry him for fifteen thousand dollars cash!"

"Oh, Nancy dear, he doesn't mean it!" Mrs. Gordon cried timidly.

Nancy did not hear her. When her father's furious fist struck the table she let go her hold upon it and drew back, staring at him, fascinated. Then she turned slowly and started toward the door.

"Nancy!" her mother's voice quavered.

The girl did not answer her; she turned and looked back at her father. "We—we may keep it a secret, the marriage—Richard leaves it to me."

"Secret?" Mr. Gordon roared, "secret? What's this? Is he ashamed of it already?"

Nancy gasped. "No," she said with white lips, "he isn't—I am."

As she spoke she went slowly out into the hall and then ran swiftly up going slowly upstairs. Mrs. Gordon sank down into her rocker. Her husband marched tumultuously about the room. A fancy, lace bordered sofa-cushion caught on his sleeve button and he sent it flying.

"Oh, Papa, you've broken Nancy's heart!"

He swung around on her, his flushed face and standing hair terrifying her.

"Heart? Broken her heart—I'd—I'd like to thrash her!" he bellowed.

"You'll have a stroke, William! you'll have a stroke if you don't stop!"

"Stroke be hanged!" he said, and rushed to the telephone. He had just thought of it.

He called up Richard. "Yes, I want to see you—now—right away! All right, I'll wait." He hung up the receiver and began to stride up and down again.

Mrs. Gordon knew the girl must be wretched and her heart went out to her. But there was a thrill of secret relief Roddy was saved. His father couldn't make him return the money now. Should she go upstairs and try to make it up to Nancy? She half rose and Mr. Gordon smashed a little glass paper weight that had fallen in his way.

"He's going crazy," she thought feebly; then she remembered Richard Morgan. He was coming soon and there would be an explosion worse than the one that had greeted Nancy. What would happen? Would there be an awful scene? She did not know what to make of this, but she had seen Nancy's face. She summoned all her courage.

"I don't think it's right to treat the child so!" Mrs. Gordon wiped the tears from her eyes. "She's done it all to save Roddy."

"You think of nothing but Roddy! I'm—" his voice broke sudden-
