The Biography of Comrade William McDonough

Written for the News by W. G. POPE

At Natchitoches on the Red River, in Western Louisiana, the Rebs had located a battery in an inaccessible swamp. From that point they fired with impunity upon all Union vessels going up or down the river. They also shelled all of the trains using the river valley. The Souaves had been moved to this territory and were striving to find some route or path that would lead to that swamp battery. But the battery seemed to occupy the only hard and open bit of ground for miles, being surrounded by a dense swamp grass thicket that thinly turfed a quagmire lake.

For ten days the search went on. The men were beginning to feel that there was something weird and mysterious about that hidden Reb battery. Then their luck changed. It was two o'clock of a dark night. One of the outer sentries suddenly had that strange premonition that some one was near him. Peering into the darkness he was sure that some object was approaching. He was about to give the sentry's challenge when the soft drawl of a negro's voice spoke: "Don' shoot, boss, I'se got sumpin' to tell yo'."

The old slave was allowed to pass thru the lines and was finally led into the heart of the camp. At first he insisted that he be allowed to tell his story to the "big cap'n" at once, since he must return, "before ol' marse found that he had left the plantation." The soldiers soon convinced him that he was now a free man and didn't have to return to the plantation at all if he didn't want to do so. The old negro was then given a blanket and was soon sleeping upon the ground. Led before General Banks in the morning the old slave said he knew of a path that led into the heart of the swamp where the Reb battery was located.

With their new found guide a company of picked Zouaves soon set out for the swamp. It developed that the old slave had been for many days carrying food to the men of the battery, and so knew the land perfectly. It was well that he did so, skillfully had the path been concealed in places and in other places it was so poorly defined and so narrow that the men walking in single file were obliged to practically step in each other's foot prints.

At last the ground became firmer and by peering thru the thicket the men in advance could see the open space. Word was passed down the line and with fixed bayonets the Zouaves dashed out into the clearing. It was a complete surprise. The Reb gunners were sitting upon some old cracker boxes, smoking and sunning themselves. None of them were carrying any weapons and before they could scarcely comprehend what had happened, the Zouaves had them surrounded.

The cannon were spiked by driving rat tailed files into the powder vents and then wheeled into as compact a group as possible. All of the inflammable material that could then be found was heaped upon their wooden carriages and set on fire.

With their hands bound behind them the prisoners were marched back to the Union camp. The hidden battery had been a thorn in the flesh of the Zouaves. Shouts of victory and congratulation now welcomed the victors, while curses and derision greeted the prisoners. The old slave was loudly praised by the Yanks and consigned to a terrible death by the villainous looks of the Reb captives.

The next field of operation carried this army of the West to the vicinity of Alexander on the Red River. Before the war this city had been a large cotton shipping port. As the Union army came upon the city they found immense stacks of cotton bales piled upon the wharves. One of these great heaps had the English Union Jack flying over it while the other carried the French colors. It is quite likely that this cotton had actually been paid for by English and French buyers. Their respective flags had then been raised over them in the hope that they might thus save the cotton until some lucky blockade runner might carry it off. Those flags, however, made the destruction of that cotton all the more certain and soon the flames and smoke and smell of burning cotton were rolling across the city of Alexander.

But this was only a small part of the work that the Union boys were supposed to accomplish at this new location. In the early spring, riding upon the freshet waters a big squadron of Union boats had pushed far up the Red River. With the coming of summer the river had lowered swiftly. Not knowing the summer condition of this river the squadron had not made the haste that it should and was now marooned near the city of Alexander. Ships lying in mud are useless. Furthermore they were in such close quarters that a fire would likely burn every ship. So the army fell to and constructed a dam across the river that was hinged in the middle and might thus be suddenly opened.

When this dam was finally completed and had filled with water the squadron arranged itself in single file with the largest boats ahead and the smaller ones bringing up the rear. At the given signal the big center doors of the dam were thrown open and on the surging outpour of water the boats dashed over the dam and down the river. It was a strange and dangerous expedient. There were some 80 boats in all and as the water plunged out of the dam there was a drop of some four or five feet into the river bed. This drop and the attendant roughness of the water caused the death of four marines who were standing on the deck of an ironclad boat. As this ship made the plunge these men were unable to cling to the unprotected deck and were swept over the side into the swirling waters. The boats could not stop. It was high tide, and now or never. The men were drowned or crushed beneath that line of onrushing boats. Such are the hazards and fortunes of war.

But the theater of war for the Zouaves and the rest of the army of the West was now to change. Grant was hammering away at Richmond, proposing to fight it out on this line if it took all summer. The losses were terrible; 60,000 men fell in less than two months. This necessitated a constant stream of reinforcements.

So we find the Zouaves in the summer of '64 fighting with Grant south of Richmond. It was in this position that an engagement occurred that brought to the minds of the Zouaves the swamp hidden battery on the Red River of Louisiana. The outer defenses of the Confederate capital on the south passed thru a low swampy marsh. In the center of this marsh was a small area of hard ground called Deep Bottom. Here the Rebs had planted a battery that was very active in the defense of the city. A company of the red-skirted Zouaves was detailed to capture this battery. This they did and as they spiked the guns the Union boys were surprised to find that these were new cannon, and upon the barrel of each fresh white paint was written the words: "From Lord and Lady —— England, to the Southern Confederacy."

To divert Grant's attention somewhat from Richmond, Lee sent General Early with 20,000 men to threaten Washington, by way of the Shenandoah Valley. Swiftly the Southern army rode up this fertile valley. Circling to the east they came within sight of the dome of the capitol. Consternation reigned in the city of Washington. Historians agree that Early could have easily taken the city. But fate had decreed otherwise. The Southern general hesitated for a day and then it was too late, for troops had arrived from Grant's army for the capitol's defense. Early then retired southward, but in a few days made another dash northward thru the Shenandoah Valley, crossed over the Pennsylvania border and burned Chambersburg.

Then it was that General Grant sent General Philip Sheridan with 30,000 men to operate against Early and to lay waste the fruitful valley that was furnishing Lee's army and the city of Richmond with supplies. Bill McDonough and his Zouave comrades were a part of Sheridan's army. They met and defeated Early and chased him southward up the valley, burning two thousand barns filled with grain and farming tools; 70 mills filled with wheat and flour besides capturing thousands of sheep and cattle. Comrade William McDonough remembers that this was a very prosperous and rich farming country. He especially recalls the giant springs that feed the Shenandoah River. These springs were so large that one of them alone was sufficient to turn a great mill.

With his victorious army in camp at Cedar Creek, General Sheridan set out for Washington for a brief conference. Somehow the Rebel commander, Early, learned of Sheridan's absence and collecting his army made a driving attack upon the Federal camp. Resting too much upon the laurels of their re-

ODD FELLOWS BUY PARKER BUILDING

Will Arrange Commodious Lodge Home and Club Rooms on Second Floor of Building.

A company of some 50 Andover Odd Fellows has organized a stock company and incorporated it under the laws of New York under the name of the Andover Odd Fellows' Building Association, Inc., and have purchased the R. A. Parker building on Main street, now occupied by the Pierce Parage. The consideration was $13,500.

The stock in the new corporation is owned 100 per cent. by members of the order in Andover.

It is the purpose of the corporation to fit up the second story of the building into commodious lodge rooms and club rooms for the use of the local Odd Fellow and Rebekah Lodges. There will be a lodge room 36 by 42 feet; a dining room with capacity for seating 60 people at once; a good sized kitchen; billiard rooms for two tables, card rooms, reception rooms, two toilets and ante rooms.

The corporation has been given possession of the second floor of the building and the work of remodeling will begin at once. They will take possession of the first floor on December 1st, when the final payment on the building will be made.

The directors of the new corporation for the first year are W. N. Rice, C. Frank Davis, J. Harvey Backus, Floyd Slocum and Earl Howland.

All stock in the corporation is owned subject to redemption at will by either Andover Odd Fellows or Andover Rebekah lodges, who will eventually purchase all of the stock and become joint owners of the building.

LIQUOR BUYER IS NOT IMMUNE

Judge Says Liquor Buyers Fail to Aid Courts and Are Subject to Indictment.

Louisville, Ky., Oct. 14.—The purchaser of liquor is subject to indictment under the present prohibition laws, Federal Judge Charles I. Dawson told a Grand Jury which was impanelled in his court today.

The jurors were told not to hesitate to return indictments against the buyer. "Don't feel hamstrung by any fear of hampering the government in indicting purchasers," the judge said. "They haven't given us a particle of assistance in the prosecution of cases."

Not a single purchaser of liquor, outside of undercover men, has given assistance in the prosecution of a bootlegger in the Western district, Judge Dawson asserted. On the other hand "these citizens who talk about 'my' bootlegger encourage others to violate the law by selling," he said.

"I want to take this opportunity of correcting the impression, which seems to be general, that it is not against the law for individuals to purchase liquor," Judge Dawson said. "This misunderstanding, no doubt, has been brought about by the wide publicity given to a recent opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the second district.

"I have not read that opinion but it is my understanding that what the court really decided was that one who purchases liquor is not such an aider and abettor of the seller to make him guilty as a seller under the federal law.

"To that extent I agree with the opinion, but if that opinion holds it is not an offense against the national prohibition act for one to purchase liquor without a permit and not on a prescription, then I cannot agree with it, because I have no doubt whatever but that the Volstead Act intended to and does, in express terms, make it illegal for individuals to purchase liquor for personal consumption for beverage purposes."

Arthur Gerkin Released

Arthur Gerken, 12 years old, of Rochester, who fatally shot Henry King, 13, of Olean, on the Haskell road, July 29, was released in the custody of his parents and placed on probation for one year, following a formal trial before County Judge Orla E. Black in Salamanca.

The boy had been in the custody of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John N. Gerken of Rochester, since the shooting, and Judge Black ruled that he be on probation for one year under the supervision of the Probation Department of the Children's Court at Rochester.

REPUBLICANS ARE BADLY SCARED

Say Cline Breaks Promise to Abide by Rules of Game.—Fear White Victory.

Now that Deputy Sheriff Schuyler Cline has announced his determination to enter the race for sheriff of Allegany county, as an Independent nominee, the Republican leaders are worried lest Archer White, the Democratic nominee will run off again with the coveted plum; and well they may be, as Mr. White is a most formidable candidate. With the Republican vote now about evenly divided there is more than a possibility that White may be elected.

In a statement given out to the newspapers of Allegany county this week, Chairman William W. Bush, of the Republican County Committee makes pretty plain his opinion of the lone runner in the recent primary contest who refuses to abide by the rules of the game and breaks the promise he made in advertisements printed in nearly every newspaper. The individual in question, of course, is Schuyler U. Cline of Belmont, deputy sheriff, who has announced that he is going to be an independent candidate for sheriff, after being defeated for the nomination in a field of four.

"It looks to me pretty poor sportsmanship," says Chairman Bush, "and I am glad to see tho desperate efforts were made to get others to jump the reservation along with Mr. Cline, they had too much political honor to do it. They proved themselves men by refusing to play the baby act, and will have the respect of their fellow Republicans for any ambition they may cherish for future favor.

"If there was the slightest suspicion that Mr. Cline hadn't received a square deal in the primary, or if an unfit candidate had been nominated, there might be some excuse for his course, but neither is the case. It was an open field and a fair fight, and tho the friends of the other candidates naturally regret that their favorites did not win, they are not crying about it or petulantly trying to upset the Republican apple cart, but are supporting Mr. Witter, who won the nomination honestly and fairly. Mr. Atherton of Angelica and Mr. Ray of Scio, who were also candidates for the nomination for sheriff, are taking the result like men and are working for the party nominee. The association with Mr. Witter in their work as deputies, they know him to be an able and worthy young man, well fitted for the position, and they are supporting him, just as he would have supported either of them.

"A number of Mr. Cline's best friends have earnestly advised him to live up to his promise made before the primary. Just why he hasn't seen fit to follow that sound advice may look like a mystery, but as in the case of a celebrated breakfast food, "there's a reason." That reason will undoubtedly be made plain before the primary is over and will be quite interesting to the public."

No Allegany county Democrat has any excuse this year in voting other than the straight Democratic ticket, headed by Judge Guy O. Hinman for county judge, and filled completely with able and efficient nominees, with at least a fighting chance of winning the election for one or two of the candidates.

County Library

Mrs. M. A. Coats of Richburg and Miss Marjorie Beal of the State Department of Education at Albany, were in Andover, Wednesday in the interest of the proposed county library and called upon the editor of the News. The ladies are very earnest in their work and seemed sincere in their arguments, but the editor of the News undoubtedly reminded them of the old saw: "Convinced against your will you are of the same opinion still." We may be dumb in the cope, probably are, but we have not been convinced that the benefits of a county library in Allegany county are sufficient for the expenditure of money which it will require to institute and maintain.

Want Dog Wardens Fired

Some of the Economic Aspects of Prohibition

Last of a Series of Three Articles by Thomas Nixon Carver of Harvard University.

Westerville, O., October 4.—In the final installment of his article on "Some Economic Aspects of Prohibition," Dr. Thomas Nixon Carver of Harvard University, thus writes:

"Not only do the wage workers spend a larger share of their money for necessaries, amusements, and means of cultivation, they are actually enabled to earn more because of the general increase in sobriety. The general disorganization of industry, slowing down of processes, especially on Mondays, resulted in a distinct reduction of the productivity of labor. Where the productivity of labor is low, wages cannot possibly be high. This is well expressed in the attitude of a certain alcoholic who refuses to abide by the rules of the game and breaks the promise he made in advertisements printed in nearly every newspaper. The individual in question, of course, is Schuyler U. Cline of Belmont, deputy sheriff, who has announced that he is going to be an independent candidate for sheriff, after being defeated for the nomination in a field of four.

Auto Club Complimented

Secretary Howland of the Andover Automobile Club, has received the following letter from the State Automobile Association:

"Mr. H. L. Howland, Secretary,
Andover Automobile Club,
Andover, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Howland:

Altho your club did not win a cup, you had sixth place in the Special Quota Membership Contest this year and will, therefore, be awarded a certificate of merit at the Annual Convention.

Suggest you get some newspaper publicity on this. You went 1.5 per cent. over your quota, showing a membership of 203 as compared with 160 in 1927 and 163 in 1928.

Sincerely yours,
WARNER BATES,
Secretary"
