dow. "Not bad countryside—the English,, he thought and then felt himself strong and confident and definitely British. He was able to stare the inquisitive fellow-passenger in the eye when he got off the train at the little village.

Learning that the best and only method of transportation was a vehicle of such age that it was thought to have once carried the first Pharoah of Egypt, he decided to walk the slight distance. Besides the walk would give him a breather and a chance to look over his notes which he had gathered in the library before leaving London.

"Let's see. George Bernard Shaw is an Irish dramatist, born in Dublin in 1856, the son of a ne'er-do-well father and a talented mother. Most of his education he acquired by himself with the help of his mother, Lucinda Gurly. He tired of business and ran away to London where he probably wrote five novels which were just as promptly rejected. In 1885 he became music critic of the "Star." Hu-m-m my paper coincidence!) at various times a reviewer, he became interested during this period in political propoganda and was one of the first founders of the Fabian Society, but was never a complete follower of Marx. His career as a dramatist began about 1894. A few of his famous plays are "Man and Superman" and "Caesar and Cleopatra." An eccentric, he considers convention lightly and is a strong advocate of vegetarianism, anti-vaccination and anti-vivisection.

Not until then did he notice that someone was strolling along beside him. Suddenly he realized that whoever this person was, he must have heard him mumbling to himself. The cub reporter looked up and scowled. To his relief his companion was a tall, thin, be-whiskered gent with a plentiful powdering of hay-seed in his graying hair. Stanton assumd a professional air.

"Just looking over some notes on George Bernard Shaw. Ever hear of his?"

The man said he thought he had, and Stanton went on. "I'm up to have an interview with him. Never saw him myself, but they say he's quite a boy. Funny sort of devil." He rambled for some time, lost in his own overgrown self-opinions. Finally they arrived at the entrance of an estate. Stanton was about to say good-bye, when the man said he guessed he'd go along up and see Shaw.

The cub reporter looked surprised. "Why-er-you a friend of George?"

The man's eyes twinkled. "No, just George himself."

A few hours later the ambulance arrived. "Nervous breakdown," the doctor said as they carried the prostrate reporter into the car.
