

THE DEBATE

I have slept through the night, John, without you.

John, it seemed as though we were both dead.

We were sitting in beautiful sunlight, enjoying our meal with the flies.

Do not laugh, my dear boy, when I tell you that my plan worked for him right.

Chicago, Ill.

JANET LEE

In the Shadow of the Gallows.

BY DAVID LOWRY.

CHAPTER XXIV.

BEARING THE WHIRLWIND.

It was as Janet said, John Lee did not deem it wise to inform his wife and daughter that the authorities had buried what they presumed were the remains of his brother Martin.

Furthermore, he had traveled many miles in quest of friends upon whom he could rely in his extremity.

He sailed upon influential friends in Boston, who wrote to the judges; the foremost people in the colony interested themselves in behalf of Janet Lee and her mother.

More than this, he now recalled many things which warranted the opinion that his wife and daughters were victims of a conspirator.

John Lee's mind was in constant turmoil, but as he listened to Giles Ellis his soul revolted.

When he left his wife and daughter in Ipswich Jail, it was for the purpose of meeting a friend whose influence was acknowledged even by the judges.

Shortly after Dorothea Lee regained consciousness, the jailer opened the door and admitted Ezra Easty and Ann Bigger, followed by Grizzle Meade.

"How now?" demanded Janet, fiercely. "By whose authority do you enter here?"

"It is this spirit I find you in?" Grizzle Meade answered, as Ezra recoiled in fear.

"I was better you were attending your customers, Grizzle Meade. The jailer shall answer for admitting you here unbidden."

"And they will not hold their heads so high to-morrow," said Ann Bigger.

"There will be two witches less in the world then," Grizzle Meade said.

"Think you we will meet on John Lee's side of the judges, as I have said?"

"I make bold to say 'tis no more Martin Lee than 'tis me."

"What brought thee here?" "To serve my old mate, Martin Lee. He thinks my blood is on his head."

"I speak naught but truth, mother." There was silence for a time, which was broken by Proctor saying:

"Now do I believe in witchcraft, since I hear with my own ears that which I would not have believed. Not and an angel from heaven had told it me."

"I have reason to believe that the body taken from the sea is not that of Martin Lee. Moreover, if the statements made to us within the past four and twenty hours be verified—which those who made them profess to be abundantly able to do—it is possible that you, Dorothea and Janet Lee, will be speedily enlarged, in which case Janet Giles Ellis without being subject to the charge of witchcraft, or falling a victim to sorcery."

"I had rather see her in her grave!" cried Dorothea, who, after bestowing a look of amazement upon her daughter, also gave way to tears.

"The thoughts of all present, and chiefly interested in these extraordinary proceedings, were so fully occupied with the manner in which they were the victims that they did not note the language of the Deputy Governor nor his manner.

"I said I had that about me," Martin Lee added, that was worth saying, as this man's face turned to the Marshal.

"If you speak of the boast you made when you struck my breast, I saw and heard you," said Sir Thomas Danforth, gravely.

"So, as I have said, I heard a footstep, and some one came into my room, and it being dark I waited until I could understand his errand; but very soon I did hear a blow on the bed, and a ghastly sigh like as if the breath were surely leaving one's body; and then I knew murder was done."

"I fear, Master Lee, you have hastened the ill most men who love their kin would avoid. It were better your brother Martin had not come on this night to Ipswich Jail. I did not think you would bring him here, or be prevailed upon to set others on his path, keenly as you feel the disgrace he has brought upon the name."
