portion of

a forti-between place all ed after h of the ide of the is about Arthur.

od Day's day and relative to the carry a king of rrough's a king of rrough's north of west of o'clock o'clock company and rr three, a coupe,

-killed

škulls

under erday.

e cor-gly it ilt of ien of ol-of

ICE IDE

nd

per sel ter ses ses ar

of ut

D,

potor?"

She was wonderfully calm and selfssessed. I could not but notice this fler words relieved me from a duty I

A have a little writing to do connected There a little writing to do connected with the case. So with your permission I will remain here until you come down." So saying, I seated myself at a desk god pean to examine the phial I had then from the dead man's hand, at the sme time drawing writing paper to me.—This phial was an odd little thing, made

Erest no...
Leonore had left the room.
Leonore had left the room.
Irealized what a shrewd trick this was as the part of the old detective, and disseasing as the idea was to me, I could pleasing as the idea was to me, I could not forget that his aims were justice it-

The innocent would nover suffer at the hads of Abner Ketcham, and if guilty it was only the right thing that they should be brought to the bar. I commenced my writing.

Some time passed by. So nervous had become that it was with difficulty that

At last I heard the rustle of skirts of the stars. When Leonore entered the library I was folding up what I had written, around the ancient phial. Hooked up into her face. Unless my spes deceived me there were traces of console her—to pour out burning words of right at her lonely situation, and to offer my services in any manner accept-able; but wisely I restrained myself. She was yet under the ban of sus-

Much as I believed firmly in her innocence, it had not yet been clearly proven, and there were some things that needed the closest investigation.

I now desired to see Mr. Ketcham.

To do so, I must go up-stairs again.
In looking around for my hat, I found that I had left it in the chamber above,

His words, innocent in themselves, tent a chill through my heart. They meant that he had discovered something with while repeating to me.

"When Leonore entered the room, she two right there for a minute with her hands classed, her oyes glued upon the bed and that motionless figure.

"Then she seemed to break the small

I could not restrain a cry.

"She is innocent, sir. A guilty soul would turn from such a sight in terror. Why the dead must even arise to condemn her did she dare do that."

d myself under his magnetic d waited to hear more.

quiet assurance of his manner that in some way gave me warning that in some way leaner had not improved her case by the visit she had made to the death bed. "She remained there, apparently con-vulsed with grief, and yet uttering no sound."

reached where one as having a decided what she said, the case.

This was exactly what she said, breathing the words in apparent deep

however, and Leonore tecame hersen

Associated the cold lips of the dead, then left the room.

I could sit still no longer.

"Do you mean to say, sir, the girl who could be guilty of such a base crime would act in that manner?"

"Wait! I neither condemn nor acquit until the returns are all in. I simply say that, according to the evidence, it looks black for Leonore.

"Remember, Doctor, the peculiar circumstances under which the girl committed the crime, if she did do.it.

"They would account for the words she spoke, and allowed her actions. She she spoke, and allow of her actions. She seemed to know that in a time of mental irresponsibility she had committed this awful deed, and bewailed the fact. At least, that was the construction I put upon the words she uttered."

least, that was the construction of the upon the words she uttered."

I was stient.

Although he had not broken down the barriers of my conviction, still his argument was unanswerable.

Before my mind was arrayed the evidence against the girl.

In one way it was overwhelming. I put it down under different heads, so that it could be regulated.

First. The photograph on the back of which the old doctor had written "Leonore—the cause of my sleepless nights and watchful days." It would indicate, as Mr. Retcham said, that there was something wrong with the girl's mind, and that her loving guardian was constantly expecting a periodical outbreak, during which she seemed to seek his life.

His assertion to the detective relative

His assertion to the detective relative to an enemy who had followed him from India might be only a blind to hide the truth, as he was apt to be sensitive upon to an enemy who had followed him from India might be only a blind to hide the truth, as he was apt to be sensitive upon this point.

I dismissed this from my mind, and proceeded to the next point.

Second. The discovery of the lock of black hair in the hand of the dead, undoubtedly torn from the head of the assassin, and that, a woman. It matched Leonore's hair exactly, and although in itself this fact was a simple thing, taken in the light of corroborative evidence it would amount to a good deal, since she had been in his Foom that bight.

Third. The footprints in the dust of the old store-room. We had fitted Leonore's small slipper to some of them, and found that they tallied exactly.

Fourth. The discovery of the Malay creese in her room. It was ostensibly a paper cutter, but was just the weapon to be caught up and be put to deadly use by a person whose mind was unbalanced, and who in the delirium of sudden insanity was bent upon taking human life. Fifth. Leonore's own words and actions, as witnessed and heard by the old detective, were strongly savored with the view of the case as he put it. She detective, were strongly savored with the view of the case as he put it. She the view of the case as he put it. She seemed to avow that she was the cause of the Doctor's death, and bewail the cruel fate that made it so. Of course a different construction might be put upon her words under new light, but just then they seemed to imply the

When all these facts were arranged in a line before me, they presented a terri-ble indictment against Leonore. No wonder I was silent. There were a few things on the other side, but as yet they were overshadowed by the colossal proportions of the opposite evidence.

I was ready to work hard in order to prove her innocence, but for the life of me just then I did not know how to begin.

While my mind had been dwelling upon

Watcham was regarding while my mind had been dwelling upon these things, Mr. Ketcham was regarding me with interest.

I could detect a faint smile lurking in the corners of his mouth, as though he could guess what was passing in my

Then for the first time I noticed he held

Then for the first time I noticed He-Hou a paper in his hand.

The thought flashed upon my mind that he had found something in the ebony desk hearing upon the case.

Perhaps it was more evidence tending to fasten the colis around Leonore.

As he held the paper out I mechanically took it from his hand.

It seemed to be a letter. There was no date on it, and yet something about the paper told that it was several years old.

the paper told that it was several years old.

I saw it was addressed to the old Doctor, and seemed to be from some friend out in Singapore.

Most of it was mere gossip about the old friends of Dr. Seabury in India.

Then came a paragraph that riveted my attention.

"And Leonore—I hesitate to approach that subject, knowing how it concerns your days and nights—how is she? Has anything occurred yet? I hope not, in Heaven's name, and that that terrible solving may never visit again my old friend Seabury."

That was all on that subject.

Sick at heart, I handed the paper back to the detective.

Well, Doctor?"

"I am afraid all roads lead to Rome,

sir."
"Then you admit that at least I have

"Then you admit that at least I nave good reasons for my suspicions?"
"Alas! it is too true."
"Doctor, you take it too much to heart. Remember that, even if guilty, the girl cannot be punished. She was insane at the time."
"What you say does not take away the stiffly sir" sting, sir?"

"See here, Doctor, am I to depend upon you any further in this case?"
I turned upon him indignantly.

I turned upon him indignantly.

No, sir; not so long as it comes to hunting down a poor girl. That is business with you, but none of mine."

"Then you wash your hands of it?"

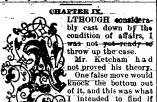

"Not at all. While you are seeking to tighten the colls around Leonore, Mr. Ketcham, I shall be using my utmost ondesyors to prove her innecesse. Wa to prove her inneed who will win the gam

His face brightened.

"Give me your hand, Doctor! I honor you for the stand you have taken. If ever that poor girl needed a friend it is now. Strange though it may seem, I sincerely hope you will succeed, but at the same time I say frankly I fear the His face brightened.

Moral."
Those worse draw me toward that man in I had sever been drawn before. I let's life. Estebam seafed in a rocker, his ages gived ages, the hieroglyphics on the celling, while I went out to start upon my hopeless task knock the bottom out of it, and this was what of it, and this was what it is uch a thing were possible.

I was arrayed against the keenest man in the detective line in New York.

My only hope lay in the fact that his heart was not in his work, while I could go at mine with the greatest of zeal, having before my eyes the vision of a woman's appealing face, as Leonore's appeared to me when she declared that if ever she had need of friends it was now.

ow.
Yes, I would be her friend, poor girl!
What was the danger she seemed to read? Was it discovery? tread?

I shut my eyes to the terrible array of evidence against her, as set forth in the arraignment of Abner Ketcham, and turned my attention toward the other side.

Certain things haunted me If the party who had cl

If the party who had climbed that trellis of vines on the night of the mur-der could be found I believed I could learn something that would be of value.

I purposed, devoting my first energies toward finding that person

Of whom could I get particulars concerning the dead man A name I had seen upon a visitor's card, coupled with the words "your old friend," decided me to visit the Sturtevant House with the intention of visiting friend," decided me to visit the Sturtevant House with the intention of visiting him.

There was a strong possibility that he might no longer be there.
I consulted the register.
"Major Beebe, late of her Majesty's Royal Highlanders, Rombay."
That was the important entry I found in the register, written in a greatsprawling hand.
"Is Major Beebe still here?" I asked the gentleman at the desk.
The clerk smiled, and replied to my question with a nod toward a rather pompous, red-faced gentleman, who was twirling his blonde side-whiskers near by.
This gentleman having surveyed me as I approached, assumed a stoical, freezing air that told me, without further investigation, that he had had some bitter experiences with New York confidence men.
"Major Beebe. I believe."

"Major Beebe, I believe."
"The same, sir. What can I do for you?"

"I wish to talk a little with you, Major, on a subject of interest. Will you be so kind as to sit with me over yonder?"

He kept up his freezing manner, but

He kept up his freezing manner, our accompanied me to the chairs.

"Now, sir, state your business," and he glanced at me through his spy glass, as though he would annihilate me.

Not one whit troubled by his fierce as though he would annihiste me.

Not. one whit trombled by his fierce aspect, I proceeded in my own way.

"I understand, Major, that you were a friend of the late Dr. Seabury."

He almost jumped from his chair.

"What the deuce. do you mean, sir, giving me such a shock? I am a friend of Dr. Seabury, if that is what you mean," he replied, with some asperity.

"When did you see him last?"

"Twenty-four hours ago."

"He was well then?"

"Unusually so. We took dinner in company in this house. By jove, young sir, am I to understand anything has happened to him?"

"Dr. Soabury is dead!"

He seemed stunned for a minute.

"This is terrible. When did he die?"

"About two o'clock this moraing."

"It must have been very sudden."

"Terribly so."

"Of what did he die?"

"It must nave"
"Terribly so."
"Of what did he die?"
coroner's jury he had by his "The coroner's jury has agreed that he me to his death by his own hand."

"The poor fellow must have lost his mind. He was the last one in the world

"That may be so, Major. I am a doc tor who was called to his bedside in the hope of doing something; but the peison was deadly and there was no hope. I wish to ask you what you know of the Doctor."

Doctor."
"We have been friends for, let me see,

possibly a dozen years."

"Was there any mystery connected with his past life?"

which has been any mystery connected with his past life?" "I have heard such hinted, but could with his past inte?"

"I have heard such hinted, but could not say positively."

"Do you know his ward?"

"Leonore? Yes, I have met her. She is a charming girl."

I thanked him mentally for that.

"What is her last name, Major?"

"Seabury, of course."

"Then she was an adopted child?"

"I always understood she was the child of his cousin, by the same name."

"Did you know her mother or father?"

"Do you know anything about her?"

"Nothing, except that, while Seabury loved her fondly, I have seen him look over his shoulder at mention of the name Leonore, as though some sudden foar had come upon him."

My heart went down to zero.

One more question.

"Major, if I affirmed it as a fact would more in the sum of the same in the same of the same in the same in the same of the same in the same in the same of the same in the same in the same of the same in the same

My heart went down to zero.
One more question.
"Major, if I safirmed it as a fact would you believe it, that Leonore has been subject to occasional spells of insanity, during which, like most mad persons, she sought to injure the one she loyed the best, and that it was this which haunted Dr. Snahury day and night."
"I would believe it possible," he replied, in the calmast of tones.
"Major, if you go to the house to see the body of your old friend, please do not say a word of having met me, or what I have talked about."

say a word of hav have talked about

"I promise you, Doctor."
Shaking hands with the soldier, I left My first attempt, instead of bringing gream of light, had added to the dark-

If this kept on, I would soon be con

At this kept on, I would soon so con-pelled to grope my way.

All my energies were now to be devoted to finding the party who had climbed the vines on that night.

I had but one clew to his identity.

A portion of his forefinger was miss-

A portion of his forefinger was missing.
Where should I look for him?
The tool he hat dropped seemed to indicate that he was a burglar, and could be found in dens frequented by such.
Being possessed of an adventurous turn, I had seen much of the great city-Still, I would have hesitated about engaging in any such undertaking, had the cause been an ordinary one.

All that influenced me was my determination to leave no stone unturned in mination to leave no stone unturned in the endeavor to save Leonore from the storm clouds gathering around her.

A feverish desire to do something was

A feverish desire to do sometiting was upon me.
Obeying my first impulse, I sought again the strange house of Dr. Seabury.
Standing beside the wall at the point where the party had climbed the wall in leaving the grounds, I looked about me.
Possibly there was some clew here which had escaped my first hasty search. I examined the ground.
People had passed to and fro, and all traces of the footprints left by the man tracked had long since disappeared.
Here and there a little knot of women were to be seen talking together in low tones, and casting mysterious glances at the old house seen over the wall and among the trees.

among the trees.
Already news of the suicide had gone abroad.

A policeman stood at the gate.
Another walked the grounds, alread nearly dry from the warm sun.
As I clambered over the wall he came toward me, motioning angrily with his club, but I paid no attention to him.

When he came up I had merely to ention that I was working with Mr. etcham on this case, and he instantly apsed.

Ie had great respect for that name.

found that the rain of the early roing had almost washed out the footrning had almost washed out the root its left by the man, t was not to examine these I had ne back.

Come back.
Was there nothing else?
Again I climbed up as the man had done, through the brambles that had grown in the breach of the half fallen

One of the obtrusive twigs caught in my pocket, and actually dislodged my handkerchief.

handkerchief.

I bent down to pick it up.

Ah! there was one of my letters also that had been deftly snatched out of a pocket by this self-same inquisitive.

pocket by th bramble bush. The deuce! I started as if shot, for, as I picked the

I started as I Sint, 107, as I power to envelope up, it felt cold and damp.
It had come from my pocket, but had lain there through the rain.
Quick as thought, I turned it over to look upon the address. This was what what greeted my eyes:

"TheoDore Parker.

"New York City."

That was all.

"New York City."
That was all.
Stay, there was the postmark up in the right-hand corner. That might be a very important clew to me.
I could make it out distinctly.
"New York, June 6, 3 p. m."
When I had read this, I could not help smiling.

When I had read this, I could not help smiling.

This very day was June 7th, and the letter I held had been mailed in the city during the preceding afternoon.

What-could be plainer?

The man who carried it must have passed over this wall since that time.

There could not be the faintest shadow of a doubt but that Theodore Parker, wheever he might prove to be, had been whoever he might prove to be, had been in these grounds during the night that witnessed the murder.

witnessed the murder.
Undoubtedly he was the burglar who had climbed the vines, bent upon plunder, and who had been concerned in some way with the crime.
Whether Theodore Parker would.

der, and who had been concerned in some way with the crime.

Whether Theodore Parker would prove a woman in disguise I could not tell yet, but I felt sure that when I found him the identity of the man with the marked hand would be fully established.

I put the letter in my pocket, for I had already seen there was an inclosure of some sort in the envelope.

Then I sought the officer, from whom I learned the address of the policeman whose beat took in Dr. Seabury's place. In twenty minutes I was rapping on the door of a neat little house.

A tidy wife opened the door and ushered me into the parlor, while she went to call her husband, who was asleep.

Presently he put in an appearance. I saw he was a good-natured fellow, and at once apologized for disturbing him.

Without much waste of time I told.

him. Without much waste of time, I told him about the suicide of Dr. Seabury, and the fact that a burglary had been attempted the same night.

"What I want to know, Deasley, is whether you saw any suspicious characters in the vicinity that night."

He shook his head.

"We see lots of 'em at all hours, so I rie shook his head.

"We see lots of 'em at all hours, so I can't exactly say as how there, was more on last night than any other time."

"Think; was there any who seemed to hover about the Seabury place?"

"Now that you mention it, my pard and me did see a fellow near the wall, a-dodging along, but we didn't pay any attention to him."

"Why?"

*Why?"

*Well, we'd seen him more than once in that place and understood that he was in love with old Seabury's gal, and that the Doctor was down on him."

"Where did you get that impression?"
"Can't say, exactly. Might have come from my pard, who's a great hand at reading stories. Anyhow, he' kinder sympathized with the feller, who was a good-looking young chap. We never bothered him."

"Then your have soon him."

Then you have soon his face?"...
"Often, sir."

What kind of a looking man was he?"

He assumed a reflective air.
"I reckon he had bright eyes, blue, I think they were, and wore a full yellow beard. When his cap was off i saw that his hair in Iront stood straight up, and that his forehead was more aquare an' white than any I ever set eye on."

The words of the policeman gave me a severe start. I thought of a picture I had seen in Dr. Seabury's chamber, turned face to the wall in a dark curner. True, that had been the head of a young boy, bright and keen, but It' had possessed the same peculiarity of yellow hair speken, of by the night patrol. Instantif there lashed across my mind the convert some connection between the 'would be burglar and possible murderey and the original of the picture that was turned to the wall.

More plainly, then, a new vista seemed opening before me.

I was delighted with my success thus far, and would not feel ashamed to meet Mr. Ketcham when I went to report my progress in the game.

Perhaps the man could establish one more link in the chain for me.

"Tell me, my friend, have you ever been close enough to see this man's hands?"

"Oh, yes, sir."

"Oh, yes, sir."
"Was there anything peculiar about

"Was there anything peculiar about them?"
"Well, no, sir, except I noticed one of his fingers was gone."
"Indeed! From which hand?"
He reflected a moment.
"The left, sir."
"You are sure of that?"
"I can swear to it. I romember he was leaning against the wall one night when we passed him, and his left hand was up against the stones. The light from a street lamp showed us his hand plain as day, and Bill; he's my pard, you know, he spoke of it afterward."
I had no more to say.

know, he spoke of it afterward."
I had no more to say.
The case was assuming such proportions that I really wished for the assistance of Mr. Ketcham, but the time had not yet arrived for me to seek nim.
I would try and find a clew to the whereabouts of Theodore Parker.
Perhaps the letter I had found would aid me.

TO BE CONTINUED.]

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

NAPOLEON AND JOSEPHINE.

Private Life Which Defends the A great deal of sentiment has been

A great deal of sentment has cell wasted over Josephine and her di-vorce, but the author of a new pri-vate life of Ronaparte by Simeon and translated from the French by Arthur Levy shows that Napoleon was fully Levy snows that Napoleon was tiny justified, apart from reasons of state, in taking the steps of separation. At the time of his marriage and for a long time afterward he worshiped her, but she was always cold and inher, but she was always cold and indifferent, seldom writing to him durlog his absence, continually and serettly contracting debts for jewelry and dress, and flually compromising her reputation by her relations with an onicer, Hippolite Charles, who had been expelled from the army or Italy by the Emperor. This scandal occurred while Napoleon was in Egypt, and was kept from him as long as possible. He was at last told of it by Junot, and determined on an immediate divorce. On his return he was met by Josephine with such a show of humiliation and sorrow and with so many vows of future devotion that he forgave her and continued to live with her, although, his love for that he forgave her and continued to live with-her, although, his love for her was dead. Later a genuine affection seems to have grown up between them, so that at last, when the divorce was decide! upon it was a matter of pain to both. Napoleon never, even atter his marriage with Marie Louise, lost interest in Josephine. The second marriage was even more unhappy than the first. Marie Louise was a weak creature, with no principle, and when the Emperor was banished to Elba, she took up with a lover with whom she had perfor was barished to had, she cook up with a lover with whom she had long had relations. Both wives, whom he had striven by every means in his power to make happy, deceived him, with this difference; while Josephine was unfaithful to him from the start. Marie Louise only deceived him after several years of marriage. In each of these unionable tried to found an exemplary and peaceful home governed by the simple of t pliest habits. Neither the splendor pliest habits. Neither the splendor of his career nor the pride of State had any influence upon his character as husband and father.—

Several chapters are devoted to the relation of what Napocon did for his officers and relatives, and the investigate shown, by them in return gratitude shown by them in return.

We are inclined to think that Mr. Levy does not sufficiently regard both sides of the question. As a general thing when Napoleon bestowed a favor upon anyone of his relatives it was saddled with conditions which were often difficult and irritating; and, besides, any recipient of his favors was never allowed to force the obligation.

sne Proved Her Love.

Don Massimo, Duke of Antikoli, whose engagement to Princes, Eugenie Bonaparte was recently announced, some years ago feil in love with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be with a beautiful Roman girl of humble but he will be ble birth, but, in spite of their mutual supplications, her parents re-fused in the most emphatic manner give their After a great deal of persuasion, however, the girl appeared to waive her objections to a secret marriage. The day of the ceremony came at last, and it was while they were standing together and taking their dealy three herself into her lover's arms and sobbed out "You shall see now how great is the love I bear you. I will not consent to this marriage. The world says that I want your title and your money. I don't, but I could never make you happy," and in spice of the Duke's urgent, heartbroken entreaties, she obetinately refused to go through the Femander of the ceremony. that the Roman maid mainder of the ceremony.

Tracing a Dark Crime.

BY ALEXANDER ROBINSON, M. D. CHAPTER VIII.

CMAPTER VIII.
Leoner was in the Hibrary.
She stood before the window looking she stood before the window looking stupen the dreary day.
It had commenced to rain, and the libd water from the trees in the window made a dismal picture, in keepwith the affliction that had visited is boos.
If the control is the stood of the water for the stood of the window was the seminal series was the stood of the water for the water f med somewhat relieved when she bond it was myself. spector, are those people gone?" she and Miss Leonore. That was the syes and his jury—a very necessary metrion in cases of this kind.

Tyes, I know. What was the verdict,

They decided that Dr. Seabury came to his death by poison, administered with his own hand."
Watching her face closely I could not that she experienced any emotion.

When can I look upon my poor old

Monthike.

Now if you desire. Are you capable glanding the shock?"

Do not fear for me; I am stronger than you imagine. Will you go up with kept at my work. At last I heard the rustle of skirts on

There rushed upon me a mad desire to uat I had left it in the chamber above, and leaving Leonore, I ascended.

I found Mr. Ketcham standing thoughtfully by the window. He turned as I entered the room, and although I loked eagerly in his face, I was baffled. "Close the door and sit dewn, Doctor."

His words, innocent in themselves.

Being deeply interested in the case, I and not do otherwise than listen, wa and that motionless figure. "Then she seemed to break the spell that bound her, and gilding forward fell on her knees beside the dead. "Doctor, I have in my time looked upon some strange sights, but never one quite equal to that, where a girl we believe guilty of murder bends over the form of her agod victim, and fondles his kand."

Then I saw her raise her head and sp her hands convulsively, while she red down upon the body. Words fell from her lips. They sched my ears, and were treasured er her shows the body.

"My poor, murdered guardy, to think that it has come at last, that which you have feared so long. Heaves forgive mafer being the cause of it all."
"Then she gave way to a fa of sobling. This leased but a start time.