Musical Glasses.

In the quaint old town of Nurembers ome instruments are preserved,known as harmonicas, which were played with the moistened finger; but I think the instrument best known is that the instrument best known is that which the composer Gluck is said to have invented, and which, by the name of the "musical glasses," was all the rage in England in 1746. Gluck ar-ranged twenty-six glasses irregularly ranged twenty-six glasses irregularly filled with clear spring water with his fingers slightly moistened.—In the Vicar of Wakefield the fashionable London ladies are described as able to "talk of nothing but high life...pictures, taste, Shakespeare, and the musical glasses," while Horare Walpole, writing the same year, 1746, to his friend, Mann, refers to Gluck's performance, but says he thinks he has formance, but says he thinks he has heard of something of the same kind before. But it was to our own Benjamin Franklin that the improved or perfected harmonica is due. He was in London eleven years after Gluck's visit, and found a Mr. Puckerage performing on these musical glasses very well, it is true, but Franklin at once said that something better could be done.

Accordingly he put his scientific wits to work, and the result was an instrument he called the armonica, to which an "h" was added, as being appropriate, and on this many celebrated musicians performed. It consisted of basits of glass strung on an iron spindle, the lower edge dipped into a trough of water. As an improvement on Gluck's method. Frunkin regulated the pitch of the tone by the size of the glasses. not the amount of water in or under them. Mozarr and many other well-known composers did not disdain to write for the harmonica, and in 1788 a "Method" for students was compiled. The very simplicity, however, of the instrument of the control of the con instrument made it easy of imitation and improvement. Wood and glass with straw were combined under various

Crows Show Fight.

Crows in large numbers have appeared along the New York and Pennsylvania border, says a Bath (N. Y.) letter. This is unusually early for these birds to be in this latitude. They have assembled in one immense colony, and sembled in one immense colony, and the weatherwise say their appearance is indicative of an early spring. Whether this is true or not, there can be no doubt that this great colony of crows is made up of a lot of extremely hungry members; and, according to the response, they are most approximate hold. ports, they are most annoyingly bold and persistent in their efforts to get something to eat. They flock in farm-yards, and sreal the food intended for pigs, cows, sheep and chickens. They also steal chickens, and have made away with many pigeons, of which nearly every farmer in that region keeps a flock.

A man named Glassmeyer took his gun the other day and went out to shoot into a flock of crows that had been particularly destructive in their raids about his place. He killed a crow at the first fire, when the rest of the flock, with deafening cries, attacked him savagely. He tried to beat them off with his gun,but they swooped down upon him so fiercely that he was obliged to run for his life. The crows followed him haif a mife to his very door. He escaped into the house, his face and hands bleeding from wounds which the crows had inflicted with their beaks and claws. The flock settled in the trees about the house and remained until toward night, cawing been particularly destructive in their remained until toward night, cawing and evidently waiting for Glassmeyer to come out. He did not go out, nor did any of his household until the crows had departed for the general
