A couple of men went out riding over the hills the other day. One of the men was an ex-saloon keeper. His first name was William. The other was a friend of his. They found the roads in very different condition from what they are in the village. All at once they came to a place where a high snow drift blocked their way. On one side of the road a steep hill rose several feet high, on the other side there was a descent of a like distance down a steep bank. The saloon keeper was driving, and expressed a fear that he would not be able to get past the snow drift. The other said, "Give me the reins, Bill; I think I can get around it." "Dad rap the reins!" "No man on earth can get around it." "And they came back home."
