Everything we wanted is ours SURE THEN AND NOW. There are those who deplore the passing of the good old-fashioned political campaign with its monster mass meetings and out-of-door demonstrations full of sound and glitter and glare. "There isn't half the enbusiasm there used to be in election vears," said an old-timer. "Just Ask your druggist for Ayer's Samaparilla. think of the Fremont and Lincoln campaigns; and I remember away back to the days of Clay and Taylor. Those were the days when we farm-

necessity for bringing together the masses to be instructed from the platform is not so great as it was fifty or complete information about the selfeven thirty years ago. The press heating iron by addressing J. F. Casey, does now, in great measure, the work winner, as everybody selling it writes once done mainly by political orators. in its praise. The irresistible logic of progress has materially changed the order of political methods. There is no longer a necessity for the old-fashioned mass | Cure. For sale by L. A. Burrows/ meeting or the barbecue to which the people flocked, a veritable "army with banners." The farmer of our community is largely a dairyman. He cannot readily care for the product of from ten to thirty cows after driving home from a political meeting ten or more miles away. His father under similar conditions in the long ago probably had from three to six cows to milk. And the necessity for driving no longer exists. Our country is a gridiron of railroads, and transportation is rapid and cheap. The number of men—in proportion to the greatly increased population who listen to campaign oratory in presidential years, is unquestionably much larger than in days of auld lang syne. Every considerable village has a hall where about a thousand persons can be comfortably accommodated, and there need be "no postponement on account of the weather," as the handbills used to read. Regularly organized and properly officered campaign clubs—an outgrowth of recent years—do and do well the work once done by the party spellbinder. But the press does the major part of the work nowadays. It is rare indeed to visit a house now where no political paper is taken. Even among the farmers, who have perhaps less time than urban dwellers to devote to reading, THESE COOL DAYS three or four political papers are regularly received and, let us hope, regularly read. The average voter in town or country is far better informed on political matters than were his fathers, is matter of congratulation, and the fact that the barbecue and the stump are no longer potent powers in presidential elections is no cause for regret. The Duke of Abruzzi, son of King

Humbert of Italy, has finished his visit in Philadelphia, where he made a pleasant impression. In return for able stock can be found in this town than is of the hospitality received, he gave a life fered by dance and cotilion and appeared to be determined to make full return for the entertainment offered him.
