canvassed officially until next month, and in some counties, New York among them, the result has not been officially declared. Enough, however, is known to make it clear that the total vote for the Prohibition ticket, Levering and Johnson, will not exceed 9,000, and may fall considerably below that figure. The electoral law of the state provides that the test of party nomination is to be 10.000 votes cast at the election preceding that at which a Governor was voted for. Therefore, the failure of the Prohibitionists to poll 10,000 votes this year was makers can at takes them out of reckoning not only were you recken next year but at the state election of 1898 as well. This is one of the most important of the political benefits which have come to the Republican party of New York, it being generally conceded that the strength of the temperance party has been drawn very largely from the Republican ranks, so much so, indeed, as to imperil its success in National elections in the past when this was a pivotal state in the Presidential election of
