The account of the temptation must have been given by Jesus to His disciples in the course of the private teaching which occupied much of the last six months of-His life. The order given in Matthew is the more logical one, though the temptations probably framed themselves to Jesus less separately and distinctly than they appear in the account. It is ence necessary to suppose that Jesus was bodily Mansported, nor yet that the temptation was entirely within Himself. The truch may lie between these two extremes ' Note the plausibility of the temptations. The first promised relief from hunger and the other two assured success in work by a manner wuch easier than that which it were to take. Observe that the quatations from Scripture with which Jesus repels the temptations are all from the book of Deuteronomy.
