during President Taylor's administration, and Sir Henry Dower, who was then the British minister at Washington. That was in 1850. This country had then entered into an agreement a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans by the way of Lake Nicaragua, which was practically the same route ins the one now under consideration. Part of the territory through which it was to pass was held by the Mosquito Indians and known as the Mosquito Coast. Over this tribe Great Britain asserted a protectorate and claimed certain rights in the premises, insisting upon having a voice in the construction and control of the canal. As a result the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was promulgated providing for a joint protectorate over the proposed waterway by the United States and Great Britain. Many vears ago the British protectorate over the Mosquito Coast practically came to an end.
