The Subject of Clothes.

CLOTHES do not make the man or woman but there's no gainsaying the fact that they help mightily. The well garbed effect an entrance into society and gain an audience more readily with personages of influence and power than the poorly clad individual. Carlyle says that society is founded on clothes. Shakespeare's quotation, "Costly they habit as thy purse can buy, for the apparel oft proclaims the man" is only too true.

CLOTHES of course, are perishable and, like taxes and rents, must be periodically renewed, and so custom sanctions and necessity compels that each season every member of society must go through the labor of rehabilition. The days for the renewal or apparel are here. Each day brings us nearer to the Vernal Equinox, when the sun stands directly over the Equator, when the day and night are exactly even, when Spring is truly here. The Frank & Levey organization of Wellsville stands ready as never before to supply all the dress requirements of Man and Boy. The stocks gathered this spring are truly noteworthy in excellence and assortment from every vantage point from which they may be viewed. They are pre-eminent; they are keyed to the tension of complete preparedness and repletion How marked is the value of that word preparedness when it applies fully and exhaustively to this great modern store which stands ready to serve the public with thousands of suits and overcoats Everything that is new is here.
