Individuality of Animals.

In a late issue of the New York Independent William J. Long gives some interesting observations on the habits of birds and animals, from which he concludes that individuality is almost as pronounced among the inferior orders as in the human race itself. This is not the first time that Mr. Long has promulgated these views, and because of previous utterances of like tenor he has been taken severely to task by John Burroughs and other naturalists. He answered Burroughs and showed himself well equipped to uphold his theory. In the present article he maintains more stoutly than ever that reason, even though in a primitive form, plays a larger part in brute life than has been supposed; that many things which have been thought to proceed from instinct are really the result of teaching and experience on the part of the animals; that different members of the same species act differently under the same circumstances; that the wild inhabitants of the forests show more evidences of reason than the domestic animals, and that what we term individual initiative is unquestionably present among the higher forms of beast and bird life.

Mr. Long gives a long array of instances to support his assertions and closes his article by citing this analogy: Sit in a box of a theater and look out over the audience only a few yards away. The men all look alike and act alike. For the moment they are alike. Sit at your window and watch the unconscious Sunday strollers at a little distance. Again comes the impression of general sameness in dress, walk, looks, actions, as if they were all alike clothed by nature and blown along by the south wind, yet these men and women represent all the varieties of human character and individuality. Only as we come close to them, live with them, know them intimately, do they show the individual characteristics which separate them from all other men and women.

Now apply that to the wood folk. We see the wild creatures almost invariably at a greater distance and at less leisure than we see the theater audience or the Sunday crowd, and we know less of their motives and springs of action. They look in a general way alike and act alike, and so we have jumped to the superficial conclusion that they are alike. That means simply that we have seen the surface of things, the passing crowd at a distance. Now go close to the animals, watch them, follow them, win their confidence if possible, and instantly they begin to separate themselves by little individual traits and habits. This is the secret of the stories of dogs and cats that are multiplying so rapidly and of the records of the few pioneers who have had the patience and sympathy to go among the wild birds and animals to live with them and watch them and find out how, in their dumb way, they live and think and feel. We are simply discovering the individual differences which separate an animal from his kind, which have always existed, but which we did not see simply because we were too far away, and were perhaps blinded also by our prejudices and our preconceived notion that wild animals of the same kind are all alike.

Who that has known and loved some horse or dog or other pet can deny to the creature the rudiments of reason? Learning to open a stable door does not come by instinct. The marvelous things that animal trainers teach their four footed pupils show that the brute goes through mental processes similar to those of man. Why may not animals teach each other? In a universe where no two things are entirely alike, why should there not be individuality in the hairy and feathered folk of the wild?

The rumors concerning the health of the German emperor are creating a good deal of uneasiness in Europe. Though official denials are frequent and positive, there is a general belief that the real nature of his throat complaint is still a matter of doubt, and, as his father and mother each died from cancerous affection, there are grave fears for the emperor. These fears have been strengthened rather than allayed by his Mediterranean trip.
