So it seems do by joining the Republican party, men who have the right of suffarage supporting its principals and policies, and voting for its active political and of boycott and of political influence and that men thru one man are workers. Both sides will be after these first voters.

But the effort is not likely to prove so great a success on the Democratic side as on the Republican. It is true that a considerable number of young men arrive at the voting age every year who by reason of their having been trained in the Democratic faith join themselves to that party. But it is a well established fact that much the larger proportion of first voters join the Republican party, and that among them are many who by heredity and precept might be expected to unite with the Democracy.

One of the strongest reasons for this is the gravitation of continued high type Americanism and his wide Tast in an address at Montpelier, the winning side in politics, as ir other things.
