Dunwody, made lead er of the party by unanimous consent. therefore determined to ride across the river bed at its shortest distance in the attempt to intercept the steamer, rely tog upon chance to secure small boats near at band should they be neves , sary.' His men by this time were glad ;

it was dark when again they mount ed; and the old river road, full t washouts, stumps and roots, made go ing slow after the moon had sunk They had, however, no great distance to ride. At a point ten miles up the river they came upon a small huddle of fishermen's buts. At one of these Dunwody knocked and the frightened tenant, at first almost speechless at the sight of so many armed men. stammeringly informed him that the steamer had nassed late that evening and was, in his belief, tied up at a little towhead island not more than l half a mile upstream.

"What heats have you got here's t on our own business.: demanded Dunwods. "No hoat at all, monsieur," rejoine the babitant. "Maybe so four, five on his t feesh boat, that's ball" "Bring them out!" was the terse.

They dismounted and, leaving their borses tied to the wood at the ru side; they went to the water's edge and presently embarked, a balf dozen men in each of as many long river skills of the type used by the dishermen . carrying out their nets. Dunwody and Clayton were in the foremost boat, and each, pulled an oar.
