Women at Polls Dispel "Electoral Fatigue"

Every year lamentations are raised in nearly all sections of the country that men are not sufficiently interested in the welfare of their state to register and vote. The fall of 1914 brings a rather more than the customary bewailing about the "indifferent voter" was distinguished by the Mayor of Boston's diagnosis of this apathy on the part of the men as "electoral fatigue." Like the gripe, perchance, the community will find the disease easier to bear now that it has been named!
In spite of an increasing population giving a greater number of men eligible for registration, the figures for this year's registration in New York City was lower by some thousands than that of last year, while the vote taken on the Constitutional Convention was an acknowledged farce.
When the eastern Mayor of Boston was exercising his mind to discover a suitable name for the marked apathy he saw, the Mayors of western cities were watching record breaking polls, the whole population a live wire of interest in the elections. Far from being concerned to dissect the psychology of a bored populace the commission of elections in two states at least had to adopt emergency measures to deal with the flood of interested voters at the polls. Not only did women vote, but they played their part as election officers.

Scattered throughout the city are about 500 little booths housing half a dozen or more election officers each," says the San Francisco Call and Post of November 4th. "Some of the men and women in these booths have had no respite since six o'clock yesterday morning. Some have snatched a few winks of sleep, and are back at their work this morning facing perhaps another fifteen or sixteen hours of tallying. The election officials bore up well under their task," said Register Zemansky. "The women especially should be praised."

The San Francisco Chronicle Reported On November 4th.
"San Francisco cast the largest vote in her history yesterday. All reports from the polling places indicated that the total vote ran very close to the registration. In spite of the great vote and the keen interest, it was a quiet election."
Some of the good residential sections of San Francisco such as the Richmond and Sunset Districts polled nearly 100 per cent. of the women's votes. The Chronicle further reports: "The Richmond District women took a deep interest in the election and probably every woman registered polled her ballot. The voting in this thickly populated residential district was characterized by quietness and was a steady grind for the election clerks from the opening to the closing of the polls."

In Kansas where women were able for the first time to cast their ballot for a Congressional election the vote of the men exceeded those cast at the Presidential election. Although there is a majority of men in Kansas, women polled 43 per cent. of the total ballot. The Commission of Elections found so unprecedented a poll difficult to handle, many thousands more polling than had been expected.
Reports from Arizona, Oregon, Washington, Colorado and other Suffrage States, show heavy polls.
"It is a fact which should be obvious that where women are encouraged to form judgments on public matters, they not only bestow themselves but have aroused their men to a keener interest. A study of the Government Year Books of Australia and of New Zealand show a higher percentage of voters taking interest in the election than in any other country.

A residue of both men and women like will always be lacking in public life. But where two halves of the human race share an interest they invariably stimulate each other.
"Electoral Fatigue" in the West, he remarked, is fatigue subsequent to a deeply stirring election. "Election Fatigue" as a Mayor of Boston saw it and named it, is the apathy and boredom of men who have seen year after year live issues sunk by the machinations of the Boss and Machine Politicians. Thousands of men have lost courage and hope in the efficacy of democratic machinery. They have ceased to believe possible that national welfare can be worked out through the exercise of the ballot.
The time is ripe for women to share the responsibilities of Government with them as they share the other responsibilities of life. The share of the burden may produce the healthy "Electoral Fatigue" of the West in stead of the moribund species of the East.
If "placard publicity" were sufficient to rent or sell property to advantage—wouldn't real estate dealing be a simple occupation?
