Putting Out Vesuvius.

A party of English and Americans were touring on the continent, and one American man greatly annoyed they went sightseeing by invariably asserting:

"Oh, that ain't much! We can beat that all to ribbons over on the other side of the pond."

When Naples was reached they went to have a look at Mt. Vesuvius, and the Englishman remarked to his American friend:

"Now, sir, can you beat that over in your country?"

The American quick as a flash replied:

"Well, I don't know that we can beat it, but we have a little water-fall over there that would put the blamed thing out in five minutes!"

Washing Rubies From Burma's Soil.

Most of the rubies come from Burma, where they are mined or washed from the earth. The Burma Ruby Mines company employs modern machinery, to which the earth is hauled in trucks that have been loaded by coolies. In the machines the mud is separated from the gravel, and this is sifted by pulsation. Finally the natives pick and wash the gravel by hand. A pigeon blood ruby weighing half a carat, flawless or nearly so, costs about $1,000 in Rangoon. There is, however, no fixed price, each stone having to be bargained for separately.

NAVAL TORPEDOES.

Chief Details of These Deadly Weapons of Modern War.

Undoubtedly one of the most deadly weapons with which navies fight one another is the torpedo.

Naturally some of the details of the Whitehead torpedo, the one used in the British navy, are kept extremely secret, but the general details of all torpedoes are exactly the same.

The shape of a torpedo is that of a long thin fish. The nose of this deadliest of all fishes is a steel pin which when it hits against its victim—a huge Dreadnought or a battle cruiser—is driven in against a percussion cap. This cap explodes the terrific charge of gun cotton in the head of the torpedo.

In the center part or body of the "tin fish" is the compressed air chamber, the air being under a pressure of 150 atmospheres. Next to this is a little device known as the heater, which keeps the engines in working order when the torpedo is being used in extremely cold weather.

The engines of the modern torpedo are marvels of ingenuity and accuracy. They are started by means of a special little catch on the outside of the torpedo—a catch that engages in a corresponding device in the firing tube as the deadly steel fish is forced out on its errand of destruction.

These engines drive a pair of propellers which force the torpedo through the water at the speed of an express train. The speed of the modern torpedo, when traveling completely under water, is fifty miles an hour.

Those are the chief details of the modern torpedo, though there are a number of ingenious devices which make a torpedo almost a "thinking" machine. One device, for instance, regulates the depth at which the torpedo will go under the surface of the water, and it always keeps that depth beneath the surface—never more, never less. Another dodge—the gyroscope—makes sure that the deadly weapon will go on a straight line and not get turned by the force of the water or by currents.

This terrible weapon weighs anything from 800 to 1,000 pounds, is some twenty feet long, twenty-one inches in diameter and costs £500 to £750 to make. There are a number of "ranges" where they are "tested," just as big guns are.
