THE REQUIEM

Washington, D. C. March 13.—Nine United States Senators laid down the burdens of office on March 4, and of these at least two never would have been elected to the Senate but for the fact that their bank accounts held millions. On the other hand two and possibly three of the most conspicuous men who have served in the upper branch of Congress in years have retired to private life, and these in the order of their importance are Root of New York, Burton of Ohio, and Brewster of Kansas. Those nine name are prominent in the minds of the people of the states that are represented, but in another session new figures will appear in the Senate and new men of great intellect will be uncovered from under their bushels.

The Arlington Memorial

From the great Mall of Washington one can look across the river into Virginia, and two conspicuous sights stand out. One is the modern wireless towers from which messages have been sent to Paris, Panama, San Francisco and thousands of miles across the ocean. A mile to the northwest, high on the hillside, clustered about by magnificent trees, stands the former home of Robert E. Lee. Its massive white pillars, and the background of the building, resplendent in the same clean white, gives one that gentle touch of the colonial which has inspired poets and writers to spin their beautiful stories around Arlington house.

General Robert E. Lee was surrounded with all the magnificence that belonged to a southern gentleman. When the war broke out he held the Confederacy. As a penalty he lost his home and estate and it became the great national cemetery. The remains of heroes of the Revolution have been transplanted to this hallowed ground; great generals of the Civil War and of the regular army have been brought to Arlington for burial; here the unfortunate victims of the battle-ship Maine found their last resting place. As though to finish the story the mast of the Maine was set up among their graves. Each year the fading ranks of the Grand Army of the Republic are recruited at Arlington, and within the last few years they have been joined by veterans of the Confederacy. A year ago a monument to the Confederate dead was dedicated in this cemetery and the blue and the gray met on an equal plane, to properly dedicate it. On Memorial Day of each year the President of the United States delivers an address at Arlington. It has become a custom that is so thoroughly established that it is almost a national institution. Lest the splendor of this great annual event might be too frequently marred, and its significance depreciated, it has been determined that a $750,000 memorial amphitheatre and chapel is to be built, and provided when occasion requires. Secretary of the Navy Daniels has turned the first shovelful of earth, and work has begun on the memorial. The contract calls for completion within two years. The amphitheatre will be circular in form, open at the top, and contains a chapel. It will provide a place where memorial exercises and other patriotic functions may be held, and where shelter may be provided when occasion requires.

Parcel Post Not a Money Maker

It was calculated that the parcel post would render an immense profit to the government, and department officials prophesied in the beginning that Uncle Sam would clean up from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually upon this branch of the service. The post-office itself appears to be in considerable of a quandary as to the results of the parcel post, but the special Joint Committee of Congress headed by Senator Brewster, has made a report upon the parcel post, and while it does not deal specifically with its revenue-producing powers it clearly indicates that this new feature in postal affairs is not a money maker.

The Post Office Department makes millions of dollars on first class mail matter, and loses it, and more, in carrying newspapers, merchandise and other classes of mail. As the principal function of the Post Office Department is to transmit communications, the suggestion put forth by Senator Weeks boils down to the plain proposition that inasmuch as letter mail is undoubtedly able to pay its own at the one cent rate of postage, the people are entitled to that rate. But there is no attempt upon the part of Senator Weeks or any one else who think as he does, to conceal the fact that one cent letter postage would mean a higher rate upon parcels and second class mail matter.

As an increased rate on second class mail matter would affect every publishing concern, it is very easy to foresee that any material growth of this one cent letter postage idea along the above lines will rapidly bring about the concerted opposition of the publishers against an in-

Wants Another Inquiry

The spectacular congressional lobby investigation of 1913 has not completely eliminated the lobby according to a statement by the most conspicuous character in the postage rates. At the same time the large shippers of merchandise through the mails will resist any attempt at "revision upward" of parcel post rates.

Undoubtedly Senator Weeks is right, nevertheless there is little probability of one cent letter postage for a good many years.

Farm Boys' Clubs

Less than a half a dozen years ago, a few boys who had made an unusual showing in raising corn on an acre of land upon the farm where they lived, were sent to Washington. The Agricultural Department took the matter up in dead earnest and now the boys are coming in trainloads. Other big bodies are made up of girls in canning clubs, but some of these girls have made the boys' clubs in raising their prize acres of corn, peas, potatoes and other products of the soil.

The Agricultural Clubs are not the only juvenile excursionists to Washington, since thousands of high school children from New York, Brooklyn, New England and all over the eastern states make their pilgrimages to the Capital each Spring and Summer
