Scott Taylor, son of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. H. Taylor of this place died at the home of his parents Friday, June 4, 1915, at 7 A. M., at the age of 28 years. Deceased had been a sufferer from heart disease for a long time, death resulting from that cause.

He leaves to mourn his loss his parents, three brothers, one sister and many other relatives and friends.

He fell from a high-chair when small and from that cause it is supposed he lost his hearing which was a sad handicap for him through life. Still he was quick to comprehend and learn, and understood from his observation what others gain by hearing. He was a young man of good habits and character and no one could say aught against him.

The funeral was held at the residence Sunday afternoon, Rev. Peacock preaching the sermon. The burial was at Bennetts cemetery.

If cannon of 8-inch bore weigh forty tons apiece, it hardly seems possible that they could have been smuggled aboard the Lusitania without the stevedore's or the officers knowing it. And if they were there for the armament of the ship it would seem that they would have had them out when they reached the danger zone. The gun story for an excuse is too thin.

The Italian Army seems to be advancing, but they may come to a sudden halt when they reach the fortified lines of the Teutons.

Great losses to the people of the State are occasioned by fires in the Adirondack woods. But then folks must smoke.

THE FORUM

TO WHOM SHALL WE BE POLITE?

By Rev. V. L. Eggleston

I.

Society is divided into classes and cliques and orders and castes and everyone is naturally polite to his or her set, but outside of that limit it is always a question to whom one should be polite. But before trying to answer this question we ought to go back a step to the source of all true politeness which is a kindly and sympathetic feeling, more or less extended according to the character and disposition of the individual. Is it possible and practicable for this feeling to be universal?

There is a view, which, if sincerely taken, must make sympathy just as long and broad as the universal life of which we are atoms.

Perhaps the thought which more than any other, would tend to excite this sympathy, is that all conscious life is a struggle for existence and attended with more or less suffering. It is sympathy with the suffering that prompts to gentle and kindly words and to helpful deeds, and the truest and deepest sympathy is always reaching downward towards less fortunate forms.

II.

Oh, the mystery of life. Who can look upon the meanest form in which beats a heart without feeling that if he could fathom that life to its utmost depths he would reach the secret of the universe.

If the gulf that yawns between human and animal life could be bridged over, if the now dumb creature that gazes up in terror toward the upright form that stands as a god, clothed in magic power, could speak and tell its awful struggle for existence, surrounded day and night by enemies, the victim of every element of earth and air, liable at each moment to be pounced upon and devoured, and most of all in terror of that to him highest known and hence divine creature, man, if this humble one, be it insect or beast or bird, could speak it must tell a tale to move the heart, to banish forever the idea of "sport" in the slaying of such things.

III.

The principle of good feeling is universal, and politeness is its highest expression. There always was and always will be grades or rank in society. There always was and always will be high and low, rich and poor, fine and coarse, wise and foolish. No philosophy, no laws and no abolition of law will ever even-up or level-down humanity. There will always be mountains and valleys and clear waters and filthy pools and storm and sunshine on the broad surface of human life as well as upon the physical plane. I am no dreamer of absolute social equality nor do I see its necessity, but in proportion to my faith in human evolution do I see human beings drawing helpfully together and expressing kindly feeling in those gentle forms of speech that we call politeness.

With whom do you and I and all of us thus sympathize? Is it with the members of some exclusive set? Are those less fortunate, less intelligent, less refined, excluded?

No one can know the answer which each and every one must make to these questions, but this is certain, in proportion to the breadth of sympathy is the breadth of mind and depth of soul. If the mind is organized on a scale that narrows sympathy to an exclusive set such persons are not to be denounced and rejected any more than they would deserve to be condemned for the misfortune of being born with any physical deformity. They are what nature and circumstances have made them and very likely they may be developing into a higher plane. The time may come when they will broaden out into a universal sympathy.

IV.

In the act of denouncing uncharitableness there may be the same spirit that is being denounced. If we despise a man because he despises his poor neighbor, what better are we than he? If we would rob those who, we think, have acquired wealth unjustly, are we not robbers? Does stolen property belong to the next thief?

There is no better means of judging character than by observing the manner in which a person reproves evil.

A style of violent and wholesale denunciation seems to raise the speaker above the common plane and the common herd. He advertises his own superiority by this means, but the greatest of all defects, a lack of human sympathy and an uncharitable mode of criticism, may be apparent in all he says. Instead of a saint he may be only a pharisee.

To whom shall we be polite? There is no specific answer to this question. A narrow sympathy limits politeness to one's own set or clique. A broader charity extends it to all who really deserve it. Universal love in the divine sense of the word would wipe out all limits of politeness and have no other form of address for any living soul.

The power of politeness for good toward those who do not seem to deserve it is wonderful, and its absence in many cases where it is deserved is one of the most deplorable weaknesses of human nature. To be rude and impolite to an industrious worker on the ground that the work is menial and hence that the work and the worker are alike to be despised, is unworthy of those who make any profession of enlightenment.

V.

There is one evil of great magnitude that results from the contempt with which certain employments are regarded. Those who engage in them are not strong enough to respect the work regardless of what others may say or do. They despise the position because others despise it and escape from it to other far less suitable for them. No one will do the despised work because no one will consent to be treated as a slave.

If it could be made fashionable to honor all work according to its actual value and to honor the worker along with it according to his value, there would result a rising of quality in work and worker that would astonish and delight the world. There would then be no menial employments, no despised positions. Inferior workers in every sphere would be condemned, but the diligent hod-carrier and kitchen servant would rank with the diligent and worthy teacher or priest, or prince.

The emperor of China goes to the fields every Spring to plow a few furrows as a testimonial of his respect for agriculture. He thus takes exactly the right means of preserving in his own heart the respect for labor which he professes.

To abstain from manual labor for a length of time destroys respect for it in most cases. But it is also true that those most constantly engaged in it do not respect it unless they have a certain elevation of character. Respect for honest industry of every grade, and genuine politeness to those engaged in it are qualities that mark only the higher type of mind in whatever rank or station.

VI.

Those who recognize social distinctions based on wealth and who also profess the religion of "the meek and lowly Jesus," are often denounced as inconsistent or hypocritical. But this is not quite fair. It is not for one person to reform society. All know that the life should accord with the profession, but if it does not, if an entire community lives, in some respect, contrary to its profession, no one man or woman ought to be expected to step out from his surroundings and be a "crank." It takes a multitude to effect a social revolution. Each individual can help the general advance and when all, or even the majority, are ready to advance, the whole body moves on.

There are poor and suffering people who owe their misery to their own vices and indolence, but there are many suffering, struggling souls who deserve to be helped out of the pit into which they have fallen or have been thrust, and if there is one duty better than all others it is that of seeking out and helping these worthy ones, not so much with money as by helping them in all their noble efforts to help themselves.

Universal politeness goes with universal sympathy. He who classes all employments as useful and therefore honorable, and as injurious and therefore dishonorable will be polite to all true servants of mankind in whatever capacity. Intimate association is another thing and depends upon many circumstances, but in manner and tone of voice the friend of all will be polite to all.

MOUNT VERNON, THE HOME OF WASHINGTON

By J. E. Jones

A pretty little story of visits to Mount Vernon on the Potomac—"impressions and sentiments like yours and mine," explain the author to those who have seen our country's greatest shrine.

Bound in colonial blue and buff with hand illumined cover design and George Washington's colonial ribbon book mark; profusely illustrated with handsome halftones and pen drawings, it is a dainty and invaluable reminder that will instantly appeal to every person who has been to Mount Vernon, while to those who have not had that good fortune this clever, happy story of our beloved George and Martha gives a clearer view and understanding of their colonial home, which is to-day the pride of Virginia and the Nation.

As a souvenir or gift book, for young or old, there is nothing to approach the elegance of this little volume, and it will make one feel more like a patriotic American to possess it.
