THE BLESSED SUNLIGHT

By Rev. V. L. Eggleston

Of all forms of heathen superstition that for which I have always had the greatest respect is the old Persian and Peruvian sun-worship. How natural it was, in the absence of any higher religion, to look upward to the starry heavens and to the glorious luminary that seemed the source of all life. Its coming and going was a daily birth and death to all nature, why not personify it as the actual creator and the true object of worship? Surely this was the most beautiful, the most elevating conception of the oriental imagination.

I should like to say a word, not to induce the worship, but to heighten the appreciation of those wondrous rays that fly through space on their mission of illuminating and vivifying our little planet, and I should like to clear away many an obstacle that hinders their appointed work.

There is so much poetry in shade, so much talk about "sparing the tree" on Arbor Day, that I almost shrink from uttering a plea for sunshine, but as this was my sole purpose in this article I will not be diverted from it, and will boldly accuse myself and neighbors of being too shy of the sun's direct rays. The human race is sadly handicapped in this regard. It is rare indeed that a ray of sunlight touches ought but the head and hands of civilized man, excepting those happy children in the country and a few in towns who are permitted to go bare-footed and bare-legged a great part of the year to the immense benefit of their health and strength.

How few stop to consider the physical difference between children carefully shod and children who, bare to the knees, are permitted to run about in the mud and through the grass and puddle in every roadside puddle, but the delight they take in it, all through the summer months, ought, of itself, to be an almost conclusive argument in its favor.

"Mamma, may I go out doors?" "Not now, my child; it has been raining and is very muddy. You would spoil your new shoes. You must wait a while."

The poor prisoner flattens its little nose against the window pane and gazes eagerly out and wishes it was a bird or a colt or anything that can go freely out of doors. Its demand was nature's instinctive cry for air, for light, for sun rays, for direct contact with that mighty magnet, the earth which imparts electric life to all creatures that do not keep themselves insulated from it. Yes, the bare foot upon the moist, clean soil is one of the chief means of health, but alas how the tenderly brought up child of the city is deprived of it.

I can never forget the piteous appeals of a certain pale, intellectual child who lived in a basement and who was always perfectly happy in the sunlight and perfectly wretched in its gloomy home. Its appeals were all the more touching because it was not old enough to express its desire in words. It just pointed toward the door and moaned. Its sister was carrying it about and tenderly trying to soothe it by talking, singing, feeding, playing, but all in vain. The poor creature would do nothing but moan or cry and continually point with its finger imploringly toward the door that led up to the light.

"He won't be quiet a minute unless he is upstairs," she said.

"Why don't you take him up?"

"Oh, I have to tend the baby in the cradle down here."

Poor child, it was years ago, but I have often wondered since whether he lived to be able to take care of himself in the street and whether he got enough sunshine and contact with mother earth to give him strength and stamina. I noticed it the more because it was an unusually intellectual family, three splendid children if only they ever got near enough to nature to live and be strong. How many such children have owed their future health and success to neglect, to being permitted to crawl about in the dirt half naked, to wade in every pond, to romp bare-footed through the fields, to go bare-headed and be brown as Indians all Summer. Blessed are the babes who can do all that and sad is the fate of those who never get near enough to mother Nature to receive a loving, life-giving embrace from her.

Oh, the blessed sun-light. We all need more than we shall ever get of it. We need it upon our bodies and upon our houses and in our living rooms. We need it to top upon the ground and all around our dwellings. May the rage for tree planting never drive the blessed rays from our dooryards nor cut it off too much from our streets.

Plant trees, millions of them, upon the hills and at the sources of all our water supplies, preserve our native forests, ornament our country highways with a row of trees on each side, but beware of the shadow that darkens the beautiful tree that cuts off the sun's rays from any portion of the roof or sides of the house or from the ground very near it, and let every room be thrown open a portion of each day to all the light it is capable of admitting.

There is poison in soil that is always damp and dark, there is malaria in it, there is rheumatism and diphtheria and every form of throat and lung complaint, that not all the medicines, patented or unpatented, can cure. Upon this point all authorities are agreed.

A sensible saying in the country is that "where wood will rot, a man will rot," that is, the dampness that rots wood will cause disease. This saying was just now quoted to me by a gentleman who said that his business had taken him into a great many cellars and that it was astonishing how many respectable people would permit dampness and filth from decayed vegetation and other causes in their cellars, a dampness that of course invades the whole house. He added a striking case of a healthy young couple whom he knew going to live in a damp basement and both dying of consumption in a few years.

It seems as if we could have no good thing without some attendant evil. It is a good thing to plant a tree provided it is planted in the right place, but close to a dwelling house is a wrong place, and out of place too are trees when thickly set along the sides of a village street. But how nice they look, how rural, how cool and comfortable. Can a beautiful tree be a bad thing if it shuts out the sun from our dwellings or from the soil in court or street. No single tree shades any spot the whole day. The shadow is always moving and the sun visits the whole surface under a lone tree. It is only when trees stand so thickly that they combine to shade the yard or the street completely in any one spot that they do serious harm and this only is what I mean to protest against, that is, against overdoing the shade tree business.

But even those who live in sun-lighted dwellings and on the driest soil and who labor or live much out of doors do not get the fullest benefit of the sun's rays. Few know the value of the "sun bath." Few have ever seen a room fitted up for them. In some cities they may be found and they should, like swimming baths, be provided in every village and hamlet.

A sun bath-room is a room lighted from the roof like a photographer's gallery where the bather lies upon a cot and receives the direct rays of the sun upon the whole naked body, the head only being shaded. A thousand years hence (perhaps sooner) human evolution will have reached the point of fully appreciating and enjoying all the advantages of the sun's rays and all the health that comes from living above sun dried soil. Let not the sun be prevented from doing its important part in this mission of purity and health.

BARGAIN PRICES.

Having heard that the suffragists of New York secured pledges of fifty thousand dollars at a luncheon they gave, the anti immediately fell into verbal fits, and frothing at the mouth, called on heaven to witness that the suffs had raised this tidy sum to buy votes from the superior sex in the great metropolis. The unabashed leader of a suffrage organization thereupon did some hasty computing and has announced that if the filthy lure is thus used, the gentlemen of the greater city will be forced to barter their ballots for the proud sum of twenty-four cents each. Such being the costly inducements held out, the public is not yet getting gray over the fear that the lords of creation in their immediate vicinity will be lured to vote for the suffrage amendment in November, in the hope of thereby providing permanently for all the future needs of their families.

WHY?

Why should New York women be taxed to pay for the expenses of elections at which only men are allowed to vote?
