GREENWOOD LOCAL BRIEFS

Wet and wind.

Abundant harvest but no harvest weather.

The rain habit, like other habits is hard to break.

Potatoes are blighting.

Cultivators are getting rusty.

Twenty Holstein cattle belonging to H. Terry at Hornell were killed by the authorities on account of being affected by foot and mouth disease. The farm where they were kept was partially flooded and the debris therefrom was washed into the river valley endangering other herds of cattle, but no further outbreak has occurred so far.

Stringent measures have been adopted to prevent a spread. There will be no cattle display at the Fair, but other attractions will be added to compensate for that.

The continued wet weather has somewhat dampened our efforts to attend the Chautauqua at Andover, but we shall go just the same. It is not often that an opportunity like the present one comes to our doors.

Bert Dennis set out for Hornell the other day, and when about a mile this side of the city he touched up his horse a bit. The animal felt touchy and kicked a piece off the dashboard, then started on a run for a wire fence. In trying to scale the fence the horse got out in the forearm quit seriously.

The trip to Hornell was thereupon given up for the time and the services of Dr. Barton sought, who sewed up the cuts and at the latest report the horse was improving.

THE FORUM

A FABLE AND A MORAL

By Rev. V. L. Eggleston

"There is no chance at all for the working man now-a-days. These big corporations get it all." "That's so," I read the other day that in the State of Ohio if the workers got all the profits of their labor they would get eight dollars a day. They average only two dollars now, so the other six dollars go into the pockets of those who don't work, the drones in the hive."

"Well, why don't the working men do something about it? It is no use talking unless you can do something."

"That's so. There ought to be a revolution. These rich nabobs are no better than thieves. I would like to see them all blown up with dynamite. That would level up things, for a while at least, and a poor man would have some chance."

The above conversation took place between two men as they walked along a dusty road towards a country village in the State of New York. One of these men appeared to be about fifty years old and he looked as though life had gone hard with him. He was poorly clad and had a limping gait and an unhealthy expression of face. The other was a stalwart young man who looked as though he had the courage to put his dynamite threat into execution.

Their conversation went on in the same strain but flagged a little as they entered the village. They were strangers there and naturally looked around with enquiring eyes. As they came near a neat, two story house the younger one remarked: "That's a pretty house."

"Yes," replied the other, "I wish I had a nice little home like that where I could rest my old bones. I have wandered about this world long enough and it hasn't amounted to much either."

Just then they passed around the corner and looked directly up to the front of the house of which they were speaking. There was a name plate on the door: Adam Strong. It caught the eye of the elder man and he pronounced the name thoughtfully: Adam Strong, Adam Strong, I used to work with a man of that name. It can't be he lives here though. But the name was unusual, the combination of those two names, and the thought of his old companion in the foundry of a neighboring city made him hesitate. He did not like to pass by without satisfying the curiosity that had been aroused. So he stopped for a moment with his fellow pilgrim under the shade of a tree that stood directly before the house and as he wiped the perspiration from his face, he said: "I would like to get a sight of this Adam Strong and see if he looks like my old friend at the Barclay Iron Works in Albany. He was a good fellow, only a little stingy about money matters."

While the two men stood there looking so seriously at the house a young girl was looking out at the front window. "Papa, I wonder what these men want here, they are looking right into the house." Mr. Strong turned toward the window and looking out saw the men plainly, at first with indifference and then with evident curiosity. He seemed to be trying to recognize them. They saw him too and for a moment they gazed silently at each other. Then Mr. Strong stepped to the door and out on the porch. This brought him but a few steps from the men on the walk. The elder man took courage, advanced to the steps and said hesitatingly: "Is this Mr. Adam Strong?"

"That is my name."

"Well did you ever work at the Barclay Iron Works at Albany?"

"I did, are you Mark Rogers?" "That's my name sir."

Then the old companions fully recognized each other and were equally glad to meet after many years of separation, for they had been apprentices—and fellow workmen together for three or four years, and, different as they were in some respects, had been close friends.

"Come in Mark, I am glad to see you old fellow, where have you been all these years?" "Oh, I've been about everywhere, but don't ask me to come in now, I am not fit," and he looked down upon his rusty and dusty suit with evident embarrassment.

"That's all right, come in, you and your friend too. Do you think I would go back on an old chum because he is a little dusty. Come right in and rest yourself and try a cool lemonade."

WHAT CATARRH IS

It has been said that every third person has catarrh in some form.

Science has shown that nasal catarrh often indicates a general weakness of the body; and local treatments in the form of snuffs and vapors do little, if any good.

To correct catarrh you should treat its cause by enriching your blood with the oil-food in Scott's Emulsion which is a medicinal food and a building tonic, free from alcohol or any harmful drugs. Try it. Scott & Bowne, Bloomfield, N. J.

"I did, are you Mark Rogers?" "That's my name sir."

Then the old companions fully recognized each other and were equally glad to meet after many years of separation, for they had been apprentices—and fellow workmen together for three or four years, and, different as they were in some respects, had been close friends.

"Come in Mark, I am glad to see you old fellow, where have you been all these years?" "Oh, I've been about everywhere, but don't ask me to come in now, I am not fit," and he looked down upon his rusty and dusty suit with evident embarrassment.

"That's all right, come in, you and your friend too. Do you think I would go back on an old chum because he is a little dusty. Come right in and rest yourself and try a cool lemonade."

"Yes, I remember, you would never take anything stronger than lemonade or buttermilk on a hot day, have you stuck to them ever since?"

"Yes, pretty much, those seem to be the healthiest drinks."

And so the way-worn travelers, who had come to town in search of work, went in and were generously entertained, for Adam Strong, in all the success that he had gained, never lost his sympathy with those who toil for their daily bread.

As the men sat on the shady porch and sipped their lemonade the conversation ran upon old times and upon their experiences since the two elder men last met.

"Well, Adam, what have you been doing all these years," said Rogers.

"I've been busy all the time," answered Strong.

"You seem to have been doing pretty well, got yourself nicely fixed, to judge from the looks of things around here," and the way-worn traveler gazed enquiringly about, wondering whether this pretty dwelling with its handsome surroundings was the property of his old companion.

Mr. Strong saw the point of the enquiry but hesitated to tell his old chum of the foundry just what he had been doing and what had been the result for he remembered the bitterness with which Rogers had been accustomed to speak of "greedy capitalists" and "bloated bondholders" and he did not want to disturb the pleasant conversation by confessing himself as belonging to the money making and bond-holding class, but in truth his years of hard work and close economy and self-education had gradually advanced him to his class, and as the old friends warmed up in conversation he was drawn on to tell his story.

All the time of his apprenticeship and afterwards he had been a pupil in evening schools, had become a skillful draughtsman, a good accountant, a neat penman; later he had made his way thru a business college, mostly by evening lessons, had been advanced by his employers year after year to higher positions and better pay and had finally become superintendent of a large manufacturing establishment and a stockholder to a considerable amount, and finally, owing to an accident that disabled him from active employments, had retired with an income sufficient to insure him and his family against want for the rest of their lives; but all this success had placed him in the class so commonly denounced as "greedy capitalists" and "bloated bondholders," the class that the wayfarers had just agreed ought to be "blown up with dynamite," as a cure for their rapacity and their oppression of the laboring man.

The facts brought out in the conversation gave Rogers a new view of the relation of capital to labor. He saw before him the result of the same kind of economy and diligence that he himself might have practiced. He saw, as never before, the plain path from hard-working poverty to competence and comfort in age and in the days of physical weakness. He saw how he might have had the "place to rest his old bones" which he had a little while before, been wishing he possessed, and as he and his youthful companion went on their way, after being so hospitably entertained, their conversation took a little different turn.

"Well, Adam was a pretty sensible boy after all. I always thought him foolish because he saved up his money so closely and wouldn't go with us fellows when we went out on a lark, but I see now that he was thinking of the future, while we cared only for the present. Well, we had our fun then and he has his now. What pretty children he has though, and what a fine lady for a wife, and here I am tramping in the dust and never had a home that belonged to me, and too late now to think of ever having one." And so the worthy travelers made their way to the factory in which Strong held some thousands of dollars' worth of stock, and to which he had recommended them for work. His position as a director secured it for them, and so old Mark Rogers got work at wages no better than he had received at the close of his apprenticeship thirty years before, for in all his years of toil he had gained little in skill and had expended all his earnings as men do who only think of to-day, letting to-morrow think of itself, and because he had laid the blame for his lack of success at the feet of the capitalist whose thrift and economy had made employment possible.

Moral

The moral of this fable is that in this selfish world the wisest thing is not to curse or rob those who have saved up more than we have, but to accept existing conditions and by thrift and culture and self denial to make life a practical success and thus reach a position where the greed of the capitalist and the pride of the selfish cannot harm us. In that position we may do much to lessen existing evils and to improve the laws in the interest of all honest toilers while the mere grumbler who does nothing to make himself wiser or better, but spends as he goes and takes no thought of health or culture, may go on grumbling to the day of doom and not contribute one atom towards the cure of any evil whatever.

KIDNEY DISEASE WAS KILLING

Until He Used "Fruit-a-Lives" The Great Kidney Remedy

"About two years ago, I was in a very bad state of health. I was not doing their work and I was run down in condition. I had 'Fruit-a-lives' advertised, I decided to try them. Their action was the result all that could be expected. My Kidneys resumed their normal action after I had taken a dozen boxes and I regained my vitality. Today, I am as well as ever."
