

Standing Room

Give me a standing place and I will move the world. The great Greek mathematician was after all the first to express a condition that is the basis of the new doctrine of EFFICIENCY. The man who moves the world, his own circumscribed world perhaps, MUST HAVE ROOM. He can not be crowded by precedent, hedged about by habits that are sapping his strength. He must have standing room on a sure foundation and he has got to prepare that foundation for himself. The question that comes home to you is what sort of a foundation you are building for yourself? Are you getting the toe-hold of dollars from which you may reach up to grasp opportunities, to protect the rainy day and dependents? Have you ever sat down with yourself and given serious consideration to future need and opportunity? Do you know a man in the community in which you live who stands for something in that community who hasn't found STANDING ROOM for himself? The man who isn't TOLLING his earnings to build the standing place from which he may view the world's struggle with complacency isn't true to himself opportunity.

BURROWS NATIONAL BANK wants to talk with you about the "Standing room" that ought to be yours, NOT OF RIGHT, but because of helpful sacrifice.

TREES AS WINDMILLS.

A growing eucalyptus, partly cleared of leaves and branches, has been used as a windmill tower by a California farmer. In search of good running water, the farmer found a spring underneath a grove of eucalyptus trees. It was found that in order to erect a windmill standard over the spring it would be necessary to sacrifice the beautiful trees. Finally solving the problem of building the windmill without destroying the trees, he mounded the fan on one of the central trees. Clearing away much of the foliage on the nearest trees, he ran braces to the windmill, and secured a machine which has given him entire satisfaction. — Popular Science Monthly.

ATROCIOUS DECORATION.
