COTTRELL, FAMOUS PRESS BUILDER, DEAD IN EAST

New York — The funeral of Edgar H. Cottrell, the man whose contributions to the printing industry made possible the modern popular-priced magazines, was held on March 17th, at the Cottrell estate in Westbury, R. I. Mr. Cottrell died March 14th, in his New York home, 924 West End Avenue, of a complication of diseases.
Mr. Cottrell's father, Calvin, B. Cottrell, before his death in 1893, made it mechanically possible to print magazines on a rotary press such as already was in use in newspaper printing. Edgar H. Cottrell developed and perfected his father's discovery. Later on he developed the press that makes it possible to produce cover and inside pages of magazines in two colors.

Multicolor work by rotary process was his next work. He made for the firm of C. B. Cottrell & Sons of which he was president when he died, an international reputation. In addition to his principal business enterprise Mr. Cottrell was largely interested in public affairs.

WORLD'S LARGEST FIG TREE

The world's largest fig tree is not growing in the Orient, as might be supposed, but right here in the United States out in the San Joaquin Valley, near Fresno, California. Last year it produced two tons of marvelous white figs which netted its owner five hundred dollars. This year the crop will be larger and even more valuable as the tree is constantly growing and producing more fruit. The tree really consists of five trees which were planted in a circle with one in the middle. At a certain age the tops were grafted together, making one tree. As fig trees live to a great age and continually increase their growth, it is figured that one hundred years from now this tree will be producing $1,500 worth of fruit annually.
