SIGN-BOARDS ON THE UP-ROAD

Hamilton B. Williams

The ancient platitude that one took spiritual location by the thot of the heart is not considered as definite. We have passed thru as many evolutions in thinking as we have kept pace with the unfolding of ideas. One is what he is potentially. Grant the perfectibility of the human consciousness and every one is potentially a citizen of the universe.

What we think indicates merely our status in transit. We are big or little, broad or narrow, friendly or unfriendly, but we're in the making.

It is very certain that present status has much to do with the fortunes of the community in which we live. That we come thru ultimately in no sense relieves the present situation. A good man . . . gives good, an evil man, evil. That is good which enlarges the diameters of life. That is evil which withholds any positive thing. The home-town people are possibly willing to admit ultimate perfectibility, no doubt wish it were not so ultimate. What they have a right to is the best one has. One finds God and himself only by the neighbor's road. One finds his spiritual treasure, not by special processes, not by shrines of fortunate endowment, not by lucky fetiches, but by becoming that which he considers good. The ultimate perfectibility will be a development of our spiritual capacities . . . and we shall have become worth what we shall be. We have the infinite energy of God to our help . . . but God does not confer; He builds; He grows; He gives; every possible assistance. But that which we shall be must be evolved out of potential.

Even the forgiveness of God is a constructive power. Sin is obliterated when it is replaced by good. There is no darkness when the morning comes.

We're in the universe forever. And we're coming thru by the vast discipline which makes character.

I, that in the beginning nestled friend, your dream-child, lift my salutation: "Good Morrow."

Who but a God-of-Love would dare the experiment, and loose a free soul at the edge of the universe into the country of Storm.

And wait until that soul should choose, at the urge of hunger-of-life, nothing more, to follow the dream thru abysses of darkness.
