ORANGE SMITH

Orange Smith was born in Andover, October 5th, 1842, son of the late Amos and Elizabeth Knap Smith, and died at his home on Greenwood Street, this village, September 28th, 1922. May 25th, 1870, he was united in marriage with Miss Hetta J. Hinger who with one daughter, Mrs. Jennie E. Williams, and two sons, Harry G. Smith, of Andover, and A. Eugene Smith, of Olean, survive, also a brother, Hiram D. Smith, of this village.

He lived as an "open book" in this community. He served his town as supervisor for several terms in a capable and efficient manner. Mr. Smith had been in failing health for several months and his death came as the natural passing of a life of usefulness.

Funeral services were conducted from the home, Sunday afternoon, by Rev. W. H. Smith of the M. E. Church.

The services at the grave in Hillside Cemetery, were conducted by Andover Masonic Lodge No. 558, of which he was a member and a Past Master.

Bavaria
 We have read so much in American newspapers about the difficulty of travelling in Germany that we were prepared for almost anything when we stepped onto the steamer at Romanhorn. There was no question about our passports being returned to us in due season, but we feared the customs officers, not because we were carrying anything into the country that should not have entered there, but just because it was Bavaria. Our first surprise came when we found that the lower deck of the steamer had been converted into a customs office and that our baggage would be examined on board. This was certainly better than we had a right to expect. We dutifully produced our suitcase keys, went thru the usual motion of lifting up the articles in one corner of one suitcase to show our willingness to co-operate with the customs officer in finding anything which we should not possess. The usual question: "Do you have any tobacco or cigarettes?" was asked, and having replied in the negative, we were told that both suitcases could be locked again. It was all simple and brief.

A few minutes after the steamer started we saw a group of passengers, more than half of them Americans, standing around in a circle on the upper deck. In the center of the circle was an officer calling out names and handing out passports. Ours was soon in our possession again. We were soon to experience a surprise number two. We possessed no German money and desired to convert a few Swiss francs. Upon inquiring from the officer who examined our passports as to the advisability of exchanging money on board the boat we were told that the rate would be much better at the bank in Linden. Upon landing, we found this to be the truth.

We were soon on the train headed for Munich, the capital of Bavaria. Our train was a very long one and was crowded. It was over 100 miles from Linden to Munich and the fare is about 25 cents. It is inconceivable that the railroads can be operated on so little money.

We secured reservations for the first sitting in the diner. It is wise to do this at the door of the diner before the train starts. It was at dinner that we saw the run-down condition of the German railroads. It seems as tho the common people have taken possession of them. The trains run regularly and the express trains make good time; but the cars need repairing, and the diners need to be scrubbed. The kitchen of this Munich train was dirty, very unlike the German hotels and restaurants, which are very clean. I suppose we have no right to complain when one considers the fact that our meal, including tips cost only 22 cents.

We reached Munich at 10 o'clock and discovered our mistake in not securing a hotel reservation. At home we were told that Americans were not visiting Bavaria this summer. To the contrary we found that every American tour was taking in the Passion Play, and that Munich hotels were crowded. It was raining and we felt miserably chilly when we were told that hotel rooms were not to be had. We took a taxi, and went to a good hotel and asked for recommendations to private homes. At 11:30 we were located in a good room. The lady of the house, a teacher of music, let us in at that hour. Our taxi cost us less than 25 cents and the price of our room, including service tax and breakfast, was less than $2.00.

The next day we could understand Munich crowds much better. Not Americans alone, but people from all over the world passed thru on the way to Oberammergau. And the German people themselves are travel mad. As the mark has declined, railroad rates have failed to rise in proportion, and travel is so pitifully cheap that crowds travel. Well-informed people feel certain of a crash within a few months, perhaps sooner, because while everyone works, the money is spent at once, for it would be of little value in the banks.

We left for Oberammergau at 5 o'clock that same afternoon, arriving at 9. A young man 18 years old, with long hair and dressed in Southern Bavarian costume (short trousers, legs bare at the knee and a green cloth hat with a feather sticking in it) took charge of our suitcase and conducted us to our lodging place. He was one of the minor players. Germany, altho Florence can boast

BOOKS FOR BOYS

The well known "Travelers Library," for young men and boys especially, arrived Wednesday, Oct. 4th. The library consists of a set of 100 books which are all famous and beneficial to young men and boys. They were placed in the assembly room in the lower floor of the town library. These books will be left there for the short time of two months and the librarian urges that men and boys come and take a few of them so that there will not be a moment lost in these two months. The boys and young men get the first chance at these so be on hand to-morrow night at the library at 7 o'clock sharp. The girls get the second chance and thus all may enjoy these books.

HORNELL GIRL KILLED BY GAS

Waneta Sawyer, 17 years of age, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Francis Sawyer, of Rockwell Street, Hornell, was found dead in a chair Sept. 24th, in the kitchen of the home. The gas escaped from a gas water-heater which was equipped with a fine and seemingly in perfect order. The parents were away from home in the forenoon and returned to find the lifeless body of their daughter. A dog which shared the room, was nearly dead also from the effects of the deadly fumes.

HAIRY VETCH

In the pleasant summer weather, rye and vetch grow green together. A boy came over hills and hollows saw the vetch and spoke as follows: "Funny little purple pea, what can you do for me? I see you twining in the rye, where it stands head high; I see your lacy leaves grow, pretty purple posies blow, what's your use, I want to know?" My beauty would be some excuse, had my vine no other use, smiling at you from the rye as you wander barefoot by. But I have other uses; root nitrogen my best excuse is. Plow us under and entomb us, rye and I will give you humus. In your field or garden plot, bury us and let us rot. With a little longer stay, mowed in June and stowed away, we make mighty tasty hay. We grow well in fall and springs; guess we have our place, by jings, in the general scheme of things." Once a better bard than I wrote of coming thru the rye. So I make this rhyming sketch in honor of rye's chum, the vetch.

The famous singer sat during the service. It is a high-backed chair and stands on a raised space next to the wall. On one side of the chair is a place for money. It was the custom for the head of any craft to sit in one of these chairs, the members of the craft sitting in a group just below him. He could see that they all attended church, and each one was re-
