GET RID OF CULL HENS BEFORE THANKSGIVING

Drop in Market to Be Expected at Holiday Time Makes Earlier Sale Desirable

Keeping the cull hens for the Thanksgiving market may be all right, say the poultry experts at the State College at Ithaca, but for their own good and for the good of the pullets who have to wait for room in the laying houses, it's better to get rid of the cull ones earlier.

The market around Thanksgiving usually drops, because so many wait until then to unload their old hens. In addition, say the experts, if the pullets are expected to lay this winter when egg prices are high, they should be established in their winter quarters before winter sets in, so that they won't be disturbed as they approach maturity and egg-production.

On too many farms the pullets which are expected to help out the family income by laying thru the winter are kept out in the cold waiting for the old hens, who have served their usefulness, to be sold.

Pullets just beginning to lay are more sensitive to disturbance than old hens, and if kept out too long, may lay "off" instead of "on" when egg prices are soaring. Immature birds will profit, too, by being well housed, since good care, comfortable quarters, and plenty of food will hasten their development and their production.

It's good farm economics to grow better products at less cost.

If the relations between tenant and farm-owner are cordial, neither side worries about a long-term lease.

Uncle Ab says: "If most good farmers took as much care of a crop after it was made as they did while making it, they would be still better farmers."

The farmer who contracts for next spring's seed corn in the fall, probably won't have to take up with an inferior variety of poor quality.

A condensed handbook on the subject is "The Curing of Meats and Meat Products on the Farm." The State College at Ithaca will send it if you ask for F. 119.

The best trees for the woodlot combine the qualities of useful wood, rapid growth, adaptability to soil and climate and freedom from insects and disease. How about the winter trees that you have? The winter's fuel supply can be so cut as to have a larger percentage of good trees.
