Drowning Accident In Belmont

Robert Gardner aged 16 and Newton Swain aged 20 years lost their lives in the Genesee river above Belmont, Sunday. Both lads, in company with Jesse Swains, Newton's older brother, had gone to the river for a swim. Gardner, while attempting to ford some rapids, stepped into a deep hole and went under. He came to the surface again and Swains heroically attempted to save the younger lad's life. The third member of the party being unable to swim, rushed for assistance. Passing motorists learning of the tragedy over on the river sped to the nearby town of Belmont for swimmers and other aid. It wasn't long before several swimmers were on the scene, but the great depth of the water and the current made rescue work difficult. Logs were hastily lashed together into a crude raft and with rakes on long poles men attempted to grapple for the bodies. An hour after the fatality had occurred, Lawrence Carpenter, a young man from Belmont, on diving from the raft, spied one of the lads on the bottom below him, but owing to the depth of the water, was unable to reach him. After several more ineffectual attempts by different ones to rescue the body, Leon H. Claus, Allegany County Farm Bureau manager, went under and after what seemed like ages, came to the surface with the body of Gardner. Immediately attempts were made to revive the drowned lad, but all in vain. In the meantime search was continued for the other lad, but it was over a half hour later that the body was found. Due to the action of the current, it had drifted inshore. Again it was Mr. Claus who arose to the occasion and did that which was impossible for most, in bringing the body to the surface. After all attempts at resuscitation had failed, the bodies were removed to Bissell's undertaking parlors at Belmont.—Reporter.
