Savers of Civilization

Electric light and power, telephone, radio, automobile, good roads—these promise to be the savers of our civilization. For they are ending a dangerous rush of country population to the cities.

Through all history, civilizations without number have crumbled and died when the cities have drained too much population from food-producing countrysides. Someone must provide food if the cities are to eat, Modern inventions and electrical engineering have found a way to bring city conveniences to the farm—to end the longdreaded isolation of country life. When you spin along a state road and see the wires running up to some hillside farm house, with an aerial on its roof and an automobile before the door, you see something that is full of promise for the future of America.

are constantly preying on them. It is said that one agency boasts of having a list of 70,000 canvassers on its books and there are scores of such agencies in this country. Just how these people work, the schemes they employ to get inside the home, the plausible reasons they give for soliciting business from house-to-house, the real "inside" to their operations will be given in the series of stories on the subject. The operations of these canvassers are so cleverly arranged that they are practically immune from arrest and prosecution. Thru these stories the public will be forewarned and thus
