Now and then it is possible for people to buy wisely without giving heed to the advertisements. But the odds are heavily against anyone having such luck.

It doesn't "just happen" that advertised values are invariably genuine buying opportunities. They have to be because they are openly offered to everyone who reads about them. The advertiser can't have two prices on one article and prosper. He does all of his business "above board."

Advertised value must be true value. Otherwise it could not keep on being advertised to people as keen and critical as the buyers of today.

The careless vogue—some folks called it the sloppy—. vogue—illustrated in the sweat-shirt and sailor pants of the youngsters and the cheese cloth and other absurdities at the windows is past.

Fashion now demands dressier clothes for either the person or the home.

In window curtains the present vogue calls for a greater use of design even though the design is frequently concentrated at the bottom of the curtain.
