FINAL INSTALLMENT He telephoned to the hangar and Elford. What's this?" iked to advance the hour of his de- kie. sire to let two enemies grow in the place of one.

Once or twice, as he loafed about the less frequented streets of Pimlico, he had the impression that he was being shadowed; but when once he walked back in desperate bold. ness to interview the man who was following him, he found it was a perfectly inoffensive stranger to the neighborhood who was trying to find a street and a number. He had work to do-vengeful work-and he completed this in teashop near Vauxhall Bridge. Mak ing a wide detour, he reached the central post office and handed in the telegram addressed to Inspector Bird. It ran:

The man who was concerned in the Taffany robbery was Luke Maddison. He is attempting to leave London tonight. His wife and Gunner Havnes are aware of the double life he has been living.

to drive the car to the lower part of Villiers Street and send the chauffeur with the suitcase to the cloakroom. She came into the south end of the Strand and the car had some difficulty in making its way thru the zeturning theatre traffic, but after a long wait it turned down the steep street toward the Embankment, and at a signal from Margaret the chauffeur stopped the machine. It was raining heavily: there were few pedestrians in sight, and those were hurrying to reach the shelter of the Underground station. She pulled at the catch of the door to open it, that the chauffeur might more easily take the suitcase at her he blundered in, slamming the door "I've chased your car from the Haymarket. Who's this?"' He peered forward and she heard! "Is that Mr. Maddison?"

"Yes, it's me," said Luke, speakmg for the first time. His voice sounded pitiably weak. He had been turned out of the police station--where he had been detained on a charge of vagrancy—in the early part of the afternoon and had not eaten since the morning."
