Another Ford Record

A Thousand Miles Per Day for 33 Consecutive Days in Desert.

The stamina, economy and endurance of the Ford V-8 is strikingly demonstrated recently when Eddie Pullen, famous racing driver, and his crew, drove a Ford V-8 33,301 miles in 33 days, 4 hours, 35 minutes, the equivalent of three years' normal driving in one month. The run was made near Rosamond, California, in the Mojave Desert, and continuing from June 6 to July 9, according to Guy S. Wood, the local Ford dealer.

Results of this unique test designed to test the performance of the Ford V-8 under harder than average driving conditions showed that the car averaged 41.8 miles per hour thruout the entire distance.

It averaged 19.64 miles per gallon of gasoline and consumed only 1 1/4 pints of oil per 1,000 miles. The first set of four tires averaged 27,625 miles each, tho they still had some mileage left in them at the time of replacement.

Pennzoil motor oils and lubricants were used exclusively and every working part Pennzoil protected, came thru without a single repair. The results turned in by the Ford V-8 prove the importance of following factory specified lubrication recommendations with high quality products.

Three regular drivers covered the major portion of the mileage but over 150 interested spectators piloted the car for near 5,000 miles. A 32-mile course was used and during the run the car was driven over 12,181 miles of pavement, 17,490 miles of oiled road and 3,630 miles of rough dirt road.

The Ford V-8 was driven at the rate of 1,000 miles per day for the entire distance—one and a third times around the world. For days the desert temperature soared to 110, 112 and even 114 degrees. The intense heat combined with desert winds and sand, and the steady grind at high average speed, to make a stiff test for both car and crew. Thruout the run was under the observation of Los Angeles newspaper representatives and the timing was officially checked by Western Union.
