A VISIT TO SANTA LAND

Snap! My whip curved far out over the long line of reindeer impatiently pawing the glistening snow. With a merry shout we were off. High, high above the tree tops we soared. The moonlit snow-covered earth became smaller and smaller—our journey to Santa Land had begun! Looking back at my companions, I beheld a motley crew. My entire English IV. Class was there, for they never like to miss anything free. It certainly was kind of old Santa to lend us his reindeer and sleigh. He had sent them down in the care of Twinkle, one of his helpers. I had hesitated a little when Twinkle had suggested that I drive, for I had never even driven a horse, and I was sure that I would never be able to steer such a host of reindeer. However,

Twinkle had assured me that it was really not difficult. I would have only to hang on to the lines The trip, except for two accidents, was pleasant and successful. The first mishap occurred when Richard became so interested in the Northern Lights that he leaned too far over the edge of the sleight. Fortunately, he landed in a tree several miles below. We picked him up quite unharmed. The other accident occurred just as we reached Santa Land. None of us had ever been there, therefore we had been looking forward to our first glimpse of Santa's kingdom. It was a sight well worth waiting for; quaintly shaped buildings with tall spires were grouped picturesquely about the magnificent palace, which was Santa's home.

It was so breath-taking a scene that simultaneously we all jumped up to obtain a better view. In my excitement, I forgot the reins, and with a suddenness which knocked us off our feet our sleigh began to perform unheard of acrobatic feats. Luck was with us, for we made a beautiful landing, upside down, in an open space before the stables.

Such a spectacular arrival brought all of Santa Land to our rescue. No one was badly injured. We immediately rushed away to see Santa Claus. We were welcomed by Mrs. Claus, who had been making a bright red cap for one of the Brownies. Greetings were scarcely over when Lloyd asked her if she had anything to eat. She laughed, but since she understood hoys, and realized how hungry we all were, after our journey, she invited us into a majestic dining hall where we

Next, Wisner, who was eager to remind Santa Claus to bring him a big toy drum, asked Mrs. Claus if we might now see Santa. She replied that he was resting but that we might visit the workshop. In the toy soldier department, Leah was delighted with the parade which the soldiers staged for our enjoyment. She attempted in vain to teach Conrad to march like a tin soldier. The rocking-horses especially interested Dorothy. She climbed upon the back of one, and vowed that, with a little practice, she would soon become an expert rider. Mrs Santa promised to put a rocking-horse in Santa's pack for her.

We had difficulty in persuading Charles to leave the doll shop, for he had taken quite a fancy tó a pretty, golden-haired dollie. However, he consented to go when Mrs. Claus said she would have Santa bring him two dolls on Christmas Eve. In one department Ruth Farwell made such an unearthly din on some of the toy instruments that Mrs. Claus hastily suggested that we visit a more peaceful shop. It was then that we missed Paul. After a long search, one of the Elves found him in the candy shop where he had been conscientiously sampling each of the five hundred varieties. Our last visit was to the wrapping department. Cecelia was greatly amozed at the lightning speed with which the Elves were working. She couldn't understand why anyone would want

We then returned to Santa's home where we were introduced to the old fellow himself. After deciding that we had all been quite good children during the past year, Santa Claus declared that he would not allow us to return home until he had given each of us a present. Just as he was about to hand me a large mysterious package, I fell to the floor with a thud. I had fallen asleep i
