economical engine to all the uses to which gasoline engines have been put suggests that we may be facing a great part of the existing manufacturing equipment opportunity for thinking; it is stimulating and makes new technological changes which will render obsolete and practice.

The history of scientific research and of the invention which follows close upon the heels of the scientists, is that a constant and steady change is now going on in every line of human activity all the time. That is why it seems foolish to put any restraints upon the free and unhampered development of new ways and, new machines.

This constant change in methods and machines . makes us a trifle unconcerned about the outery that we must conserve our petroleum reserves. In the first place, nobody knows what those reserves are. In the second place, the general use of Diesel engines will result in a reduction in the amount of oil consumed per !
