Red & White Hi-Lites

"Let's Have Some Stewed Elephant or Octopus Steak for Dinner!"

Supposing some friend of yours made this suggestion. First you would shudder and then you would laugh at the preposterousness of the idea—and yet both of these foods form customary parts of the menu in far-away lands.

Food habits vary immensely with geography and the things we eat, which seem so right and customary, would cause equal shuddering to natives in distant countries. For example, we are a nation of pork and ham eaters, and the pig, which is considered a farm scavenger, would not be touched by many tribes.
