INFANTILE paralysis begins much like an acute cold, with fever, headache, vomiting, congestion and night sweating, to be followed in many cases by weakness of muscles. The child should be put to bed immediately. Extensive experiments are going on with serum for this disease, and scientists are not yet sufficiently sure of results to justify widespread use. From six to eight weeks after the acute condition has passed, some power will return to the muscles; it is then that muscle training and massage is begun.

SPEAKING of animal experimentation, sometimes called vivisection, the late Dr. Charles W. Eliot of Harvard said: "The humanity which would prevent human suffering is deeper and truer humanity than the humanity which would save pain and death to animals."

TEETHING is an important period in the life of a baby. Mothers expect complications at this time. If the baby is restless, refuses to eat, has an elevated temperature and shows signs of swollen gums, he may be teething, or he may be getting into some other kind of trouble. Serious disturbances start in the same way and are easily confused with the teething process. A mother should be careful not to rely too much on her own diagnosis after all she has had experience with only a few babies at most. The doctor has observed many.
