The professions are overcrowded, and many graduates will find it necessary do other than that for which they had studied and prepared them-

This situation today is more in tense than it was three years ago, as statistics prove. There are many seekers for fewer jobs, and the jobs pay less. It is true that the expectation of recovery has sent many young folks to college, with the idea that when they had graduated "things might be a little better off." Then, shall we say that the time has come to question the valuation a college education? Not at all. So we must at present think of college more in its non-money-making virtues. There is always the proof that college training prepares one for the larger chances and greater opportunities. Even if this education doesn't return every cent spent to it, but enlarges the social and inner life, doesn't it more than pay for iself? If it leads only to a finer appreciation of life, it need never be considered worthless.
