AROUND OUR HOUSE

SWEETS FOR CHILDREN

Sweets for children should contain little sugar and many body-building and regulating substances, says the New York State College of Home Economics.

Ripe fruits, fresh or dried, raw or cooked, are natural sweets that may safely be given to normal young children. Such fruits as oranges, apples, dates, raisins, and figs will satisfy a child's craving for sweets and at the same time bring to his diet valuable vitamins and minerals.

Fruits and fruit juices are desirable for the same reasons and also because they increase or stimulate the natural appetite for food. If given as a mid-morning or mid-afternoon lunch they tend to make the child hungrier for his regular meal later.

As children grow older, they may have the simpler desserts consisting of sugar combined with milk and eggs in puddings, custards and ice-cream; simple cookies; and light, simple desserts, without the danger of developing a desire for those that are over-sweet, heavy and hard to digest.

Sweets given to children should replace another dessert, and, like a dessert, should come after the child has finished the main part of his meal. Marshmallow-stuffed dates, figs, or prunes are relished by most children. The prunes and dried figs used in this confection should be soaked over night, or until they are soft, then dried, stuffed with the cut marshmallow, and rolled lightly in sugar.

Letters, flowers, gifts and numberless acts of kindness to herself and family.

Mrs. Nellie Payne of Whitesville died Tuesday at Jones Memorial hospital, Wellsville, after suffering two shocks during the past few days.

LITTLE BITS OF HUMOR

Camera!
Billy Buena Vista: "If you keep on looking at me that way I'm going to kiss you."
Sally Sierra: "Well, don't be all day about it. I can't hold my face this way indefinitely."

Encouragement
He: "This music is delightful. I could dance on like this forever."
She: "Oh, don't say that. You're bound to improve eventually."

Science Note
Chemistry Professor: "What can you tell me about nitrates?"
Student: "Well—er—they're a lot cheaper than day rates."

Careless
Sailor: "They've just dropped their anchor."
Mrs. Symp: "Gracious, I was afraid they would! It's been dangling outside for some time."

Frankness
A tramp called at a home not long ago, so reports have it, and asked for a little financial assistance.
"But why do you beg?" asked the lady of the house.
"I'll tell you the truth, Mum: I begs to get drink."
"But why do you drink?"
"To get up me courage to go around and beg."

Old gentleman just rescued from drowning: "Thank you, my good man; I'll remember you in my will."
Scotch Hero: "We'd how about cutting me off now with a shilling?"

SAGAS OF THE SKIES

PILOTING the huge clipper ships which have welded more closely than ever before the two Americas, is a responsible job and not one which can be taken lightly. But there are times when the pilot's responsibilities are submerged in the sheer joy of flying over the tropic seas of the Atlantic. Then it is that the pilot gets the maximum enjoyment out of his work. Placid seas below, clearing skies ahead, rhythmic motors purring contentedly, radio communication with the land and a feeling of mastery over his ship make flying a pleasure rather than a task.

Such was the mood of Captain G. J. Ekstrom as he piloted his huge craft over the ocean north of Colombia. The sea spread out below him, catching the rays of the sun and the shadow of the huge clipper as it soared along. Suddenly ahead a rocky island and what he thought was a ship, beached near its shore. As he approached closer he could see human beings aboard the schooner, which by now he discerned had been shipwrecked. He swooped low enough to observe the plight of the men on the ground.
