"The Good Earth" Coming Here

A refrigerator for plows and furniture—A humidifier for imported rugs—A shock-absorber for a water-wheel!
 These were a few of the strange expedients made necessary in handling the oddest collection of properties ever brought to a studio, the five thousand-odd articles, ranging from parts of buildings to scraps of costumes, imported from China for "The Good Earth," co-starring Paul Muni and Luise Rainer, at the Andover theatre, November 13 and 14.
 The properties were purchased while in use on Chinese farms and were crated and shipped to Holly-wood. Wooden plows, water-wheels of intricate design made of many pieces fastened with wooden pegs; utensils, tools, costumes actually worn by North China farmers, were part of the big collection.
 John Miller, in charge of the properties, decided the California climate would warp the wooden plows and cultivating implements, so he arranged a special room with an even temperature a veritable refrigerator, for them. The matting rugs and wall pieces, it was found, became brittle with dryness, so a humidifier room was arranged with wet sacks supplying moisture to the air.
 The hand-made water wheels were mounted on rubber when transported by truck to the location where they were to be used, so that no traffic jar could dislodge parts from the wooden pegs.
 The collection of six months in the Orient. The studio unit visited farms, bought them outright, and collected and shipped every movable article, from irrigation wheels and parts of buildings to kitchen utensils and clothes, to the studio.
 The work was done with the cooperation of the Chinese government, which assigned General Theodore Tu, head of the court martial board during the Shanghai invasion, as technical aid on the picture.
