torian sighed to himself. "They're all gone. There": for adventure. There's no more room books about the opportunities of the past."

Meanwhile, in an industrial laboratory in the same, city, two men were bending eagerly over a small flame and an array of plass tubes. They were watching the last stages of an experiment that had taken over year. They were research men employed by an industrial company; their experiments were being backed up by that company; and they were on the verge of discovering a new product that would mean new jobs and new paychecks for hundreds of men.

The learned historian would never think of looking for new frontiers in industry. Yet that is just where they are to be found today.

Today, these are to be found in science and research, working with American industry to produce the progress that can come only when new ideas are turned, from theory into actuality. In that field, there lies far more scope, more of a chance for adventure and progress than Daniel Boone or Buffalo Bill or Davey Crockett ever had.

The learned historian, lost among his dusty books, is very short-sighted indeed if he neglects these things. Last frontiers? Americans will never recognize them. There are no last frontiers for America!
