ELLEN GETS HER MAN

Unconsciously, Ellen recoiled slightly at her cold, almost arrogant survey. Yet the man was smiling, disclosing two rows of even white teeth.

"This is Bernard Deteroux, lass," panted the factor. "Bernard—my daughter, Ellen."

Deteroux bowed slightly. "I am honored, mam'selle."

Ellen murmured a reply and when they had seated themselves old Angus went on with further explanations. "Bernard is one of our men, lass. He is our roving source of supply. His duties are to keep an even balance in the trade goods at our various posts. Tell me, lass—is there anything we are in need of?"

"We have enough of everything, father," said Ellen slowly. "Except perhaps of blankets."

"I will be pleased to oblige, mam'selle," broke in Deteroux quickly. "A hundred pairs, perhaps, would be enough?"

"That would be enough, Mr. Deteroux," nodded Ellen.

"Good. You shall have them immediately." He stepped to the open door and in a deep resonant voice shouted an order down the slope. "The blankets will be at your store-room in five minutes, mam'selle."

A moment later Ellen left the room to assist Gitchie in preparation of the midday meal. She found the old Chippewyan squaw working in the kitchen in a strangely silent mood, and despite Ellen's curious questioning, Gitchie would utter no word. And later, when the meal was over with her went out to the store-room with her father and Deteroux. Ellen saw old Moosac bend a look upon Deteroux of frank, savage hostility. This, reasoned Ellen, was plainly overjoyed at the presence of Deteroux, and she knew that both Gitchie and Moosac were very faithful to her father.

For herself, Ellen found it hard to define just how Deteroux affected her. There was an undeniable magnetism about the man. His very size, his rippling strength, and the lithe, easy swiftness of his movements and the gleam of his white teeth were attractive. And he was not unhandsome. Yet his eyes were repelling, and whenever Ellen felt them upon her, which was disconcertingly often, she was hard put to it to keep from shuddering openly. The man was at once attractive and repulsive.

When the blankets had been properly checked in and receipted for, Deteroux and Angus Mackay left again, but Ellen stayed at the trading room, once more immersed in the study of her father's predicament, and trying to plan a course of action that might avert the threatened calamity of the following spring.

Here, an hour later, Bernard Deteroux came to her alone.

"You will pardon me, mam'selle," he began swiftly. "But I have a great affection for your father, and it would be well perhaps if you and I should talk of a certain injustice which the future portends."

Ellen knew immediately what Deteroux meant, somehow, doubtless thru the channels of gossip, or because Angus Mackay had confided in him, this gigantic riverman knew of the threat which hung over the old factor. Tho she would not acknowledge it, Ellen realized that the task of rehabilitation she had set herself loomed as well nigh impossible. — Therefore she seized upon Deteroux's suggestion with unconscious eagerness.

May Warn of Discouraged Kidney Action

Modern life with its hurry and worry, irregular habits, increased eating and drinking—the risk of excesses and lack of sleep—throws heavier stress on the work of the kidneys. The urea and its by-products are not so easily eliminated and other impurities from the blood.

You may suffer nagging headaches, backache, dizziness, nervousness, irritability, depression, and generally tired, nervous, all over aches. Other signs of kidney trouble are: water in the eyes, swollen ankles, and a general feeling of weakness.

Try Doan's. It's Doan's that's the kidney to use of Doan's. Doan's has been a century of public approval. It's the only kidney medicine that's been around for over 50 years.
