AROUND OUR HOUSE

CARE OF SLIP COVERS

A slip cover can be protected from wear and tear, and the laundering or cleaning reduced if the arms and back of a slip-covered chair are covered with removable pieces of the same material, cut so that the designs match. Such protectors can be made large enough to lie flat if the edges are finished with cotton tape and pressed.

However, for a chair that receives very hard use, frequent laundering or cleaning of the entire slip cover is necessary. The college of home economics at Cornell tells how to launder slip covers made of preshrunk, tubfast materials:

Washing:
Use mild soap and carefully squeeze the cover up and down in the suds, or wash it in a machine that will not tear or pull it out of shape. Rinse the cover carefully; do not twist or wring it but squeeze out the water and wrap the cover in towels, old sheets, or newspapers to remove excess moisture.

Drying:
Hang the cover on a line to dry or leave it rolled as mentioned—until it is to be pressed. If hung out doors, turn it wrong side out and hang it in the shade. Be sure that no excess moisture runs down into the hollows of the cover.

Pressing:
Most covers should not be pressed until they are nearly dry; press them on the wrong side and avoid shiny marks caused by too hot an iron. The grain lines should be kept straight.

Dry Cleaning
Because of the difficulty in pressing, many homemakers prefer to have their slip covers dry-cleaned. Home dry cleaning is not recommended because of the fire hazard.
