character, Abraham, and we are shown how obedience to God developed life to its fullest for him. Abraham is revealed first as following Terah, his father, from Ur to Haran, and it is noteworthy that no definite cause is stated for this departure although subsequent writers interpret it religiously, perhaps rightly, maybe not so.

From Haran, Abram (as he was first called) was directed by God to leave his kindred, although the divine voice only promised to show him his destination later, and for such obedience great blessings were vowed. Abram obeyed the call that came into his heart, and journeyed forth into a strange country on faith. So, his name became synonymous in after years with absolute confidence in God's providence.

All of Abram's record is not inviting. During a sojourn in Egypt, driven by famine as was Jacob later, he passed his wife off as his sister, very profitably to himself. The ruling Pharaoh was attracted by the beauty of Sarai, and courted her, by means of presents and gifts to her "brother."

However, the deceptions discovered in time to prevent serious sin, and Abram leaves Egypt "rich" in cattle, in silver, and in gold." Later in life the same episode is repeated, this time with Abimelech, a Philistine king, ending exactly as before—no harm done and Abram enriched again!

The record of this early chieftain wasn't written to picture him as perfect, yet a modern writer dilates on the refusal of Abram to take the spoils of warfare and distinguishes the cases by calling the Egyptian Pharaoh noble and the Sodom ruler wicked! The reason for the last refusal by Adam himself—then powerful and rich in his own right.

The story of the battle between the kings is interesting. Some scholars question it, while others identify the names in the 14th chapter with the other ruling monarchs of that early day. The most striking feature of the story is the meeting of victorious Abram and Melchizedek, King of Salem and "Priest of God Most High." This religious feature is one of the many mysteries encountered in the Bible. How came he, in Canaan, to know God and be recognized as his priest? Had God revealed himself to other peoples of whom we have no record? Centuries later we find Paul comparing the preisthood of Christ as like unto Melchizedek's.

However, in Abram's life we have the story of a man who allowed God to control his life. He broke from well-known surroundings at the divine command, and he made his home in the land where the same spirit spoke to him. There he erected his altars.

We are not supplied with all the why's and wherefore's, but the extolled virtue of Abraham was his confidence in God. He was content for his life to be moulded by the higher power.

No one thing would contribute more to contentment and peace for an individual than to listen to the spiritual calls in life and follow them. Man sacrifices quiet enjoyment and satisfaction in a mad grapple for the things he wants—lacking the faith to be patient and trust in God for the future.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

A PIONEER OF FAITH: ABRAM.
International Sunday School Lesson for August 2, 1942.
GOLDEN TEXT: "Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward."
—Genesis 15:1.
(Lesson Text: Genesis 11: 31-12: 9; Hebrews 11: 8-12.)
In considering our lessons from Genesis, we should bear in mind the benefit sought in Bible study, not a record of men or of science, but a progressive revelation of God the Creator, and his ideals for man.
The record of creation opens our Bible to present a compelling reason for obedience to high purposes subsequently to be unfolded. From then onward, the scriptural books show us by specific lives how God reached men and how men sought to understand God.
The short sketches of Adam and Eve and the start of sin (disobedience to God) the harmony between God and Noah, which caused his family alone to be saved to the world. Today, we take another
