SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
JACOB'S VISION OF GOD
International Sunday School Lesson for August 23, 1942.
Golden text: "I am with thee, and will keep thee whithersoever thou goest." — Genesis 28: 15.
Lesson Text: Genesis 28: 10-22
We read considerably of Jacob in Genesis. The author of Genesis had received from tradition and racial records of a meager sort more definite and certain data upon which to write. Later on other characters will be developed even more fully, but here about Jacob we have a fairly complete biography, with its numerous sidelights and inferences drawn from his rich experiences.
Jacob started life in error. Being industrious and home-loving the younger twin was the favorite of his mother, Rebekah, who conspired with him to obtain the coveted blessing from the patriarch, Isaac. Esau seemed to lack foresight. He was deficient in the ability to persevere. Hungry and physically tired, Esau was willing to barter the birthright for a mess of pottage, which the thrifty Jacob had. Jacob to his discredit, was not above taking advantage of the necessities of the situation and drove a hard bargain. Later, both were to repent; Esau in sorrow over the loss and Jacob in fear of the results.
We must not blame Jacob too greatly. In an age when force and cunning were entitled to all benefits obtained and influenced by his ambitious mother he deceived his blind father, telling several direct lies in the transaction. How often mothers err in pushing their children ahead in the outward recognition of the world at the cost of their spiritual welfare! How many mothers in their excess of love would willingly join with Rebekah in the cry, "upon me be thy curse, my son." Yet, because of Rebekah's advice and his weak following, Jacob fled for his life, destined to an absence of more than twenty years. Rebekah's arbitrary and fraudulent interference with the situation separated her from her loved son and resulted in her disappointment.

Naturally, Esau resented the fraud practiced against him and openly spoke his threats against Jacob's life. Rebekah arranged for Jacob's flight, telling his father that he must secure a wife outside of Canaan, and Jacob departed for Padanaram, the old ancestral home of the father of the family.
Back across hundred of miles the young man slowly made his way, meditating upon his own course in the past few years, probably questioning the wisdom of wrong-doing. At Bethel, soon after his departure, Jacob enjoyed a vision of God's protection and care and, with faith in the reality of Jehovah's promise, vowed to follow his God and act as his steward. At Bethel, Jacob was repentant and his immediate danger and loneliness made him realize his dependency upon the higher power. It changed Jacob's life and hereafter he is a different man.
A great vision in early manhood or youth, with faith in that vision, is a great blessing for any man. Idealism carries a man beyond his sensual and physical surroundings, comforts and sustains him in the difficulties of the way and stimulates within himself a power and a faith to keep the desired end within sight. Jacob dreamed of greater days. Esau, on the other hand, was practical; when hungry he questioned the value of the future. "I am at the point of death, and what profit shall the birthright do to me?" Based upon calculations of self-profit no great vision or ideal can appear paying to the pioneer.
Jacob's romantic meeting with Rachel, how he greeted his cousin and kissed her, and how love came into his life makes a very appealing story. For seven years Jacob labored for his uncle, Laban, as the marriage offering for his daughter, Rachel, who was "beautiful and well favored." No prettier compliment or more admirable tribute to this great passion which comes into the life of men was ever paid than in the record here as to "these days of servitude: "They seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her." Deceived by Laban into marrying Leah, Jacob worked seven years longer for Rachel. Throughout his life, his heart beat true to his first love and she remained the central attraction of his family.
In Jacob's life we have an illustration of the unhappiness of polygamy. Between the two sisters jealousy and envy came, making life hardly contented or happy to either. The Old Testament records man's life as it developed from primitive days, but is not to be taken as a guide to our present conduct. That these ancient characters (held up to us as God's own followers) should have plural wives and apparently suffer no rebuke from God, doesn't mean necessarily that such a custom is now quite proper. It only means that those ancient folk hadn't the full realization of God's nature and desires, that revelation hadn't completely been interpreted, and it is well to bear in mind the world centuries later to picture God's spirit and nature to mankind laboring under erroneous conceptions. God hasn't changed but the correct understanding grows and develops with the ages.
We invite our readers to turn to Genesis and read the story of Jacob. It is too full and quaint to go into its interesting details here. However, notice this, that following his experience at Bethel Jacob lived for many years with Laban, who said to him, "I have learned from experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake." In the midst of many strangers, in an alien country, Jacob remembered and followed his God, as Joseph, his son, was later to do. It speaks many things in tribute to Jacob's character.
