LESSON

SUNDAY SCHOOL

JOSEPH SOLD INTO SLAVERY

International Sunday School Lesson for September 13, 1942.

Golden Text: "Love envieth not." I Cor. 13: 4.

Lesson Text: Genesis 37: 23-36.

The story of Joseph is one of the interesting romances of the Old Testament. It reads like a modern story with its unexpected developments and ends with everybody happy and in prosperous condition. Joseph's character stands out in unusual prominence, being one of the old patriarchs of whom no great sin is recorded. Throughout the record, the portrayal of him is one that wins respect, gains sympathy, and causes rejoicing at his ultimate great success.

Joseph's boyhood was marked by unusual traits and events. He was the favorite of his father, Jacob, being the elder son of Rachael, the beloved wife. The affection bestowed upon him and the faith entained in regard to him by Jacob were justified by subsequent developments. Joseph proved faithful in every trust and his fidelity to righteousness and principle was remarkable.

Joseph's brothers hated him, understood from a human standpoint. He appears to have fixed his convictions early in life as to the errors of life about him, and whenever one of his older brothers acted otherwise, Joseph promptly carried the news to old Jacob. A tattle-tale, as it were, and the world, as such, doesn't admire such performances, especially the victims of such straight-forwardness.

However, it should be borne in mind that Jacob trusted Joseph probably with reason, based on experience, and purposely sent him out to obtain a report on the way his other sons were taking care of his business. It was Joseph's duty to report the truth, and he did so, to his credit.

Modern society suffers many evils today because, under a mistaken idea as to good-fellowship, good men and even officers of the law wink at violations of the statutes. Often it is our duty to report, to discountenance certain customs, and only the recreant and unworthy would want another man to sacrifice the integrity of his life to shield shortcomings.

Men in public life allow graft to pass unchallenged rather than make a row, sit quietly by at misgovernment and political favoritism unless the issue is driven into their faces in so public a way that it can not be avoided. Duty often leads to unpleasant tasks but all honor to the man who shoulders the burdens regardless of popularity or personal fortune.

Another cause of the jealousy of Joseph's brethren was the open preference Jacob exhibited in his behalf. Rather unwise for a parent, jointly responsible to all his children, and usually creating resentment among the other sons and daughters. In Joseph's subsequent peril, only one of his brothers sought to preserve him from any disaster, but he was only successful in reducing the crime from murder to selling Joseph into slavery.

Joseph had dreams, which he frankly and innocently related to his family circle. These were interpreted as indicating that Joseph would rule over them all and another cause of envy and animosity was engendered. Only Jacob, fond parent, found fond enjoyment in the contemplation of the heights to which his son might go. Aside from the lesson proper but interesting is the speculation as to why dreams were relied on then, and God's abandonment of such tokens to man later. Dreams play a big part in Joseph's life—what do you think about them?

Joseph's dreams may have reflected the living thoughts of the youth. The high station which the dreams held out may have been the sleeping reflection of the living ambition in the heart of this Jewish boy. There may be some who will condemn such a spirit. It is well to keep in mind that ambition, like most things in life, can serve both good and evil purposes. An ambition to accomplish something commendable or to develop into a distinguished personality is excellent if accompanied with unselfishness and a desire to serve.

These visions to the youthful Joseph probably had a great influence upon his life. Youth is the period of dreams, when ambition takes shape and ideals influence action. Too often the world has suffered because young men and women refuse to follow the call of a great challenge, either deprecating their own possibility or questioning the aid of Providence in accomplishing their goals.

Age, with the stern realities of life, chills the inspiration of idealism, and doubts the potency and genuineness of the dream. Our advice to young people would be to treasure their dreams and visions and to apply their energies and capacities to their fulfillment. Joseph's brothers were intensely irritated with him. They resented his predictions and they were jealous of the favor he found with Jacob. So, one day, near Dothan, they saw him coming and said: "Behold, this dreamer cometh," and discussed killing him. Reuben suggested that they leave him in a dry well and Judah subsequently proposed that they sell him into slavery, which they did. His coat, the emblem of his father's partiality, was carried back to the aged Jacob as evidence of Joseph's death. Yet, as we go into the story later, we shall see how all things work for good to those who trust God.
