Upon returning from market and the washing or the well, the women gather in the courtyard to beautify themselves. Flower mongers and sellers of rings and+ other such jewels are called in as they pass the house and the women arrange their hair and so on. The silver trinkets are worn only on their feet and ankles, whereas the gold ornaments are reserved for the arms, ears and head. New flowers are bought every

Having thus beautified - themselves, the women talk, especially since Fai, daughter of DaDa, is soom to be married. DaDa is bringing home the prospective groom at supper time. Fai does a dance in honor of her marriage to come, after which the evening meal is prepared.

The groom to be is brought home and Fai very shyly hides until ordered to come out from behind the curtain and her groomto-be sees her for the first time.

The sun begins to sink as the family sits down to the evening meal, the men eating first (with their fingers) and the women esting afterwards from the same plates as their husbands or broth
