He is too immature from birth until about five years of age and he must build slowly and leave his fate up to his parents, who do a mightly fine job. They clothe him, feed. -him, protect him, teach him to do things for himself. They teach him morals and religion, and prepare him to enter school.

When he enters kindergarten he begins building at a more rapid pace and more and more things are expected from him. If he does these things without balking he has a toe-hold on a thriving life. While he is in the grades, both his parents and teachers have to plan for him and guide him over the rough spots just as a businessman must accept loans of money and advice to get him by the do-or-die stage in his busi-

Upon entering high school he is mature enough to start planning for himself and deciding which walk-of-life he wants to enter. This decision is the most important one-he will ever make. for, if he embarks upon building toward a life's occupation and later finds he is not happy with it, he will not prosper, but will allow his business to run-down and be--come worthless.

Now that he has made a decision he must include in his high school education the subjects which are going to be the most helpful in the molding of a successful life. A person planning to enter engineering must include all the math and science subjects that are available and one enbarking upon being a musician must acquire a great deal of musical background. No matter what field one plans to enter one should take subjects other than those which are going to be directly useful in building toward his occupation, for he must know how to wick carry on a conversation and to get along with people.
