Area Resource Development Advisory Committee Meets

Twenty-five members of the Resource Development Advisory Committee braved the sub-zero weather Thursday to attend the first regional meeting of the resource development project, at the Farm, Home and 4-H Center in Ellicottville. The resource development project is an Extension effort coordinated through the agricultural agents' offices and includes Chautauqua, Cattaraugus and Allegany Counties.

Representation on the committee includes 30 members, and is comprised of men active in the forestry industry, agriculture, recreation, business, commerce, local government, and other occupations in the three county area. Also represented on the committee are professional men representing various federal and state programs in agriculture, conservation, commerce, and the colleges of forestry and agriculture.

This initial meeting was held primarily to organize for action, and to exchange ideas relative to a more complete development of our forest lands, and the hill lands that are being retired from agriculture in this area of the state.

The members of the committee heard a report from Martin Anderson, Extension Agent in Resource Development, concerning his impressions of the region, and five broad areas of opportunity for resource development, following his two month study of the three counties.

The afternoon session included a two hour group discussion of these five suggested areas of opportunity. These included private personal recreation, commercial recreation, forest production, forest products utilization, and public planning. Discussion was lively and participated in by all members present. Interest was particularly high in projects for recreational development on lands being retired from agriculture.

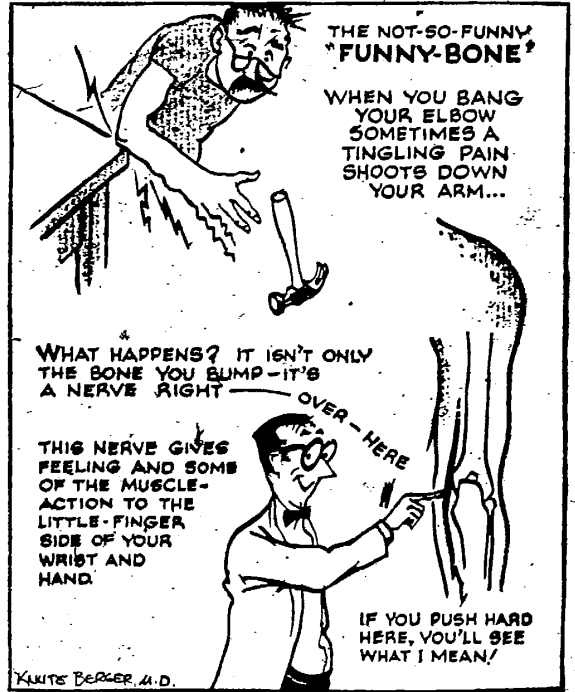

The committee plans to meet again in late February.
