that can play havoc with our mid-winter health is pneumonia. It used to be deadly—one out of every four cases fatal. It can still kill, but the advent of penicillin and other antibiotics plus early, proper treatment makes the disease much less frightening, and the cure much more possible.

Pneumonia attacks mainly in two forms:

Lobar pneumonia, which infects the entire lobe or section of the lung, is caused by bacteria. The disease hits suddenly, sending the temperature soaring, and otherwise making the patient know he's really sick.

Bronchopneumonia has various causes—including bacteria, viruses, physical injuries, lung—and instead of involving an entire lung section attacks only the small root ends of the bronchial tubes, or breathing passages. The disease hits less violently than lobar pneumonia, but its tendency to relapse may in the long run, be more dangerous.

As with many other Respiratory Diseases, the prevention of pneumonia depends largely on general good health. Pneumonia strikes when resistance is lowered by such things as bad diet, fatigue, or careless health habits. Your tuberculosis association points out the importance of practicing good health principles in order to throw off serious infection when it threatens

February Forebodings

It's an ordinary February, not a Leap Year! That fact may displease a few, but it can be heartening to public health officials.

It means one less day of winter's wear and tear: fewer ankles broken on slippery pavements, a slight decrease in fainting spells received from shoveling snow, and one less 24 hour period in which to catch a Respiratory Disease.

One of the Respiratory Diseases
