

F. Corwin McAndrews
F. Corwin McAndrews, formerly of Sinclair and at present Staff Specialist in Engineering in the Office of the Secretary of Defense is moving to Palo Alto, California to assume duties as Senior Consulting Scientist in Research and Engineering for Lockheed at Palo Alto.

Alfred University on a Hamilton Ward Scholarship and received the BS in Mathematics and Physics. At the outbreak of World War II he was employed in Sinclair's Experimental Laboratory. He enlisted in the Army Air Force, earned six bronze campaign stars for active participation in the Pacific Theatre of War and was discharged as Captain.

Subsequent to the war he settled in the Washington area to work on a Doctorate in Electronics at Maryland Graduate School and MIT concurrently working as an Electronic Engineer in the field of radar. He distinguished himself by winning an outstanding government award for original design which saved million of dollars for the Government. In 1956 he was one of a group selected to help close the missile gap with Russia. In this capacity he provided technical direction to many of the nation's major missile and space projects including ATLAS, SCOUT, AGENA, MMRBM, MISSILE B, and TITANS I, II and III. It is generally accepted that the gap no longer exists, and more of the nation's efforts are being focused on space.
